However, there were also moments that demonstrated the musical experimentation that made San Francisco famous. The verses of many songs were broken up by melodic improvisations and time changes that in their own way were as freewheeling as any avant-garde jazz. Kaukonen plays in a finger-picking style that is full and accomplished, but never sounds too flashy or cluttered.

The show opened with "Hesitation Blues," a Hot Tuna classic which was unfortunately marred by problems with the sound system. This was followed by "Uncle Sam Blues," an ominous traditional tune re-arranged by Kaukonen during the Vietnam era and which has a chilling relevance today, thanks to the magic of geo-politics.

"I'm gonna do some fighting/Of that I can be sure/I want to kill somebody/Won't have to break some kind of law." This was followed by the chiming chords of the optimistic "I'll be all right."

Towards the end of the set, Kaukonen was joined on stage by guitarist Michael Falzarno. The two played together on several tunes, including "Third Week in the Chelsea," the evening's only Airplane number.

This was followed by "Walkin' Blues" and "Death Don't Have no Mercy." Especially in the latter song, Kaukonen pulled out some scorching lead lines. Both of these songs are also covered by fellow San Franciscans the Grateful Dead, but Kaukonen expresses more true gritty blues power than the over-pretty melodies of Jerry Garcia, or the narcissistic posing of Bob Weir ever could.

The blues is about suffering, but it is also about redemption and good times. The Iron Horse is an ideal place for such music; something about all that wood makes it a perfect location to sip some suds while a talented bluesman strums and picks.

At moments the playing was somewhat ragged or meandering, but Kaukonen proved that 20 years after leaving the Airplane, he can still fly all over the frets. And he has a gold tooth to boot.

The show was opened with a pleasant set by Bluegrass singer and guitarist Roy Bookbinder. The high point of his performance was an affective version of "Statesboro Blues," a song made famous by the Allman Brothers.

Choreographers visit campus

Contribute to UMass winter dance concert

By JEN SIEGEL
Collegian Staff

It may be too soon to think about winter but it isn't too soon to think about this year's winter dance concert by the University of Massachusetts dancers. In addition to this year's contributions, the performance will feature pieces choreographed by visiting artists from past years.

Frank Chavez was the first guest at the University from September 5-9 and offered a piece of jazz flavor called "Tender Feat." Chavez has taught workshops and classes throughout Japan and the United States and is currently in his third year as a dancer with Hubbard Street Dance Company.

William Soleau, at UMass from September 16-29 has a ballet piece in the works and as yet, it is untitled. Originally a dancer, he is now a freelance choreographer and as a student at Amherst College in the early 70s, he participated in the Five College Program by taking classes at the UMass Dance Department. After graduating from Amherst with a B.A. in Art History — the College would not recognize Soleau's dance credits for a major — he went to New York City and started dancing in the Joyce Trishler Danscompany. His first big choreographing break came when he was asked to be the resident choreographer for the Dennis Wayne Dancers. Soleau was also dancing and touring with this company and in a few years decided to stay on as choreographer only, allowing himself time to do work on other projects. His return to the University was in part a favor to his mentor Richard Jones, artistic director of the University Dancers.

Soleau credits Jones with playing a major role in his professional life, both by encouraging him, as his teacher, to travel to New York and then by giving criticism and advice as his friend. Coming back, Soleau said, "I wanted to give back what I got from the University [both in terms of instruction and encouragement]."

Jones said someone who once went through the dance program and who is now a professional can be "a tremendous incentive for the students who are here." Soleau's work, which will draw from his eclectic background, is dedicated to the memory of Seth Kreisberg, a professor from the School of Education who passed away last year. "It will be about life, death and moving on."

Laura Glenn is at the University from October 15-26. Currently, she is artistic director of Laura Glenn Dance and is on the faculty of the Juillard School in New York City and at Rutgers University. Her presentation is a modern work entitled "Feathering."

University's bloody hands

Pornography destroys. Wimmin (sic) are bleeding in the phallocentric empire, dying in a war waged by men for men's own benefit: as sexual slaves, objects, things to be possessed. Wimmin exist — only — for men.

Owen Broadhurst

No womon (sic) is ever safe, even on our campus — especially so — because men have been taught to think of wimmin as something other than human, indeed "Other" precisely.

Porn is one reason why this happens. Of course, it is symptomatic of this sickness called society. But in combatting and actually destroying a misogynist and heterosexist institution, inroads are made in challenging all such institutions' legitimacy.

UMass, however, doesn't get it. Our "non-sexist" administration, like most good liberals, sees absolutely no conflict between its mission and the sale of misogynist propaganda.

UMass and the University Store have taken this active role in oppressing wimmin, in the defense of "free speech," incredibly.

The fact that free speech is denied the victims of pornography — how-to manuals on how to beat, abuse, slash, humiliate and devour wimmin — does not even register.

UMass will oppress wimmin happily, then act appalled when wimmin are raped on our campus. UMass ignores its own hypocrisy, failing to see that its hands aren't clean. It fails to see the sale of porn as complicity.

The Undergraduate Senate addressed this issue, demanding of the Board of Governors — a body that has clout in the University Store's operations — some effort to remove the how-to rape manuals.

The Board of Governors acted predictably — condoning sexist exploitation and the sale of anti-womon propaganda. Like UMass, the Board, in its failure to combat oppression, is complicit in the crimes that have happened on our campus.

Meanwhile, there is now word of outrage from the Senate, which is complicit in its silence.

Wimmin are living in a war zone, always subjected to sexual harassment and even violence — and this is happening here, now, right on our campus. To "combat" all this however, the University has targeted the Student Escort Service and the Everywoman's Center.

This year, to complete their violent assault on wimmin, has attacked the Everywomans' Center with a vengeance again. As they do this and, they take away students' litigation rights — by removing them from the realm of economic feasibility — the very bloodthirsty University tells men, "Hey! Date rape is ok." By selling pornography, we can see where the priorities are.

When it comes to violence against wimmin, one wonders where the leaders are. Student leaders have done little in combatting it, and even less in attacking materials promoting it.

When in the University Store, complain about the pornography. Write the Campus Center Director, demanding he remove it.

The time may well have come when the students need to see this removed themselves, by simply taking it and eliminating it. Its very presence is a violent assault, and we need to react against it immediately.

Pornography destroys, and UMass is an agent of repression. It is high time we "persuaded" them otherwise.

In the past few years, six out of nine programs offered by the Everywoman's Center have been either cut or "frozen." The most recent cuts are threatening to close the Counseling program and Public Relations and Outreach program.

We, the undersigned SGA and GSS officers, feel there is a difference between the priorities of the Student Affairs Office and the needs of the student community.

Obviously, the Division of Student Affairs does not view the Everywoman's Center as critical to the "health, safety and welfare" of the student body. We do.

The losses in the Everywoman's Center affect everyone on this campus; it is not only a women's issue. This is also an issue of student rights and administrative priorities.

We would like to take this opportunity to encourage students to become involved in what is happening to the Everywoman's Center and in Student Affairs.

There will be a candlelight vigil today, Sept. 26, at 7 p.m. on the Student Union steps near the Campus Pond.

We encourage students concerned about the EWC and Student Affairs to make their voices heard.

Act now to save the Everywoman's Center.

Professional journalism entertains with the art of the simple

I spend much time arguing with (belittling, denigrating, etc.) Professional Journalism. In fact, last week a Professional Journalist friend and I were taking cocktails on the veranda of his home and discussing current events over a game of darts.

The crux of our dialogue was the ability of You, the Reading and Viewing Public, to deal with the complexities of current issues.

Pointing to recent events such as John Silber's victory as the Morton Downey Jr. Party's Candidate for Governor, my companion defended the Professional Notion that the public can't or won't spend time sifting through details. In short, said he, we write at a fourth grade level because that's What the Public Wants.

People understand what they do based on the information they are given. Feed them simple, two-dimensional accounts of world events and what do you expect? Further, said I, The Press aims at people's hearts and wallets, not their minds.

Coverage of recent unrest in S.A. screamed "Black on Black Violence!" and "Tribal Warfare!" etcetera ad nausiam. We both realize that these headlines have nothing to do with the reality of the situation. Instead of relating the complex struggle for the soul of a new South Africa, our News conjures up images burned into our minds by Tarzan movies.

On one hand, my friend still maintained the public couldn't be made to understand. He mumbled 'Details do not a newspaper sell.' Also, he offered, it's the Editor's fault. (I recalled Mark Twain's account of Napoleon shooting at an Editor: "He missed and hit the publisher, but at least his intentions were noble.")

Jeremy Levinson

Bullshit. It's Professional Journalism and its sister occupation, electoral politics, that have taught the public to rely on ready-made, pre-understood, soap opera-like portrayals of world and community events. The News would use footage of an exploding nun than help people understand an issue.

My Professional-type friend agreed, finished his cocktail and repeated his line, "That's what the public wants." Then he stood up, pacing: "Keep it exciting! We don't want quizzical expressions on people's faces as they muddle through details. We want Sweat! Tears! Rage and Sympathy!"

Then with his finger in my face: "It's not my goddamn job to educate! It's my job to entertain!" He fell back into his chair.

I said ok, if you want to take responsibility for the War He groaned. "What the hell are you talking about now?"

Professional Coverage of the Mid-East has prepared this country for war. Instead of hashing out the issues, The Press has created an image of the of the Arab World as populated by two groups: Pro-Western Arabs and Fanatical "Hitlerian Madmen." I acknowledged the fact that Professional Journalism finally has shown that there is at least one difference amongst "The Arabs.' Before the recent Gulf incursion, this detail wasn't to be found in The Press.

He tossed darts while he talked: "We print everything the public needs to know about The Arabs. Oil, Islam, Violence, The Veil, Princes, Kings. So what if the public doesn't realize the complexity of Arab cultures or understand every little issue."

Hey, Mr. Journalist, got any kids between the ages 18 and 35?

No.

Didn't think so.

The right to commit a crime greater than women's freedom

I have a question: Have we committed any crime? I just want to check with you people, because the last crime I committed was running a red light in Boston.

Stupid question? Maybe. But I want to know the answer, because we're being punished for something, and I want to know what it is.

Don't walk alone at night, if you must walk at night at all. We're just asking for trouble, after all. I like walking by myself. It gives me time to think. It relaxes me, or used to, until I learned that people have the right to make me a target.

My schedule is so insane that I'm usually able to only do it at night, but if I do, I'm breaking a curfew imposed by some higher authority. Punishment sometimes never comes, but if it does, I'm told it's my own fault.

Punishment can mean robbery, rape, assault or murder. But it's my own fault, for breaking curfew. Maybe it's me. I guess my knowledge of my rights is very rusty, but I thought that it was okay for me to walk on public property whenever I wanted. I must be wrong. It is a robber, rapist or murderer's constitutional right to commit a crime. It must be, since every time such crimes are committed, the survivor is blamed. How dare we.

Gainsville, Florida. It used to be reasonably safe to stay in your own home, with the doors and windows locked. In fact, it's mandatory. But we're still punished when we are in our prison cells.

Someone has the right to come in, rape, torture, mutilate and kill you. Ted Bundy was the new American dream incarnate. In many cities, bars are on the windows of first floor apartments, to keep criminals out. Or is it to keep us in?

Pamela McCarthy

Remember when home was a haven? When home was a place to live? Home was a place to relax, and shake off the day you had or savor it, depending on how well it went.

Then, when we had to lock our doors, we rationalized it. We could still relax, we just had to make sure the place was locked up — that we were locked in — before we could feel comfortable. Now, with the doors and windows locked and barred, we still are targets. And the excuse is the same. "It's your fault." Really.

How dare I not get a supercharged burglar alarm, attack dogs and an electric fence. I must be implying permission for any number of mudswine to break into my house, since I do not have these things.

There are places we can't go into. In many cities, the limp and lame excuse for many crimes is that the victim was in a "bad" area, or the victim's skin color wasn't color coordinated with the neighborhood's. If it isn't, people think you have a right to commit assault and murder. "If Black people stayed in their own neighborhoods, this never would have happened." "What did they expect, they were in a bad area."

I didn't know that criminals were given specific places to live and hang out and that we were still segregated. I thought the Jim Crow laws were repealed. I'd better get a plane ticket, because I want to go home. I thought I was in America, not South Africa. The country I live in is not supposed to have martial law as a regular, everyday fact of life. The country I live in is supposedly one of the most adamant about personal rights and individual freedom.

The country I live in is supposed to give you a fair trial, and tell you what you are being charged for. We haven't even been told what it is we've supposedly done to deserve being in prison.

Would somebody please tell me what it is we've done wrong?

Mohawk Nation sends letter to people of Canada

Editors Note — This is the fourth of a multipart series on the situation of the Mohawk Nation in Quebec, Canada. The writer is a Collegian Correspondent who is currently in Kahnawake, Canada.

By RIC OLIVEIRA
Collegian Correspondent

The following is an open letter to the people of Canada from behind the barbed wire at Kaneheatake from the Mohawk Nation released last Monday.

"Since July 11, 1990, we of the Mohawk Nation and it's allies have attempted to reach a peaceful conclusion to the present crisis which had its roots long before that date. As all Canadians know the problems between our people's stems from the unwillingness of Canadian political leaders to address, on a long term basis our legitimate concerns and rights. Though Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourness have repeatedly recognized the legitimacy of our claims and promised to initiate a process to address them in a real manner, it remains but lip service.

"The leadership of the Canadian and Quebec Governments have abdicated their responsibilities as the elected civilian authority since the beginning of this crisis. They have never negotiated nor discussed the issues, nor the problems which you, the Canadian public know in your hearts are real and in need of resolution.

"During the last ten days, we behind the barbed wire have exchanged numerous communications with the military. It was not our desire to avoid discussions with your civilian leadership. We had no choice! Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa have ignored their oaths of office, by delegating their political decision making authority to the military.

"While we have attempted to communicate with your civilian leadership, all our efforts have been stymied by the military, which is obviously making all the decisions, militarily and politically on behalf of YOU, the Canadian public.

"During the last ten days the military has engaged in numerous violations of national and international law. These include:

- Denying us access to doctors and medicine.
- Denying us access to winter clothing and other necessities of life.
- Denying us access to sufficient amounts of food.
- Interfering with all of our communications, including those of our spiritual advisors, families, political leaders, lawyers, the international community and in fact, other Canadian elected officials.
- Preventing journalists from behind the barbed wire from telling the world what is going on inside.

"These violations are nothing new to this crisis. The Canadian Government still maintains some degree of control over the army and S.Q., yet these same rights are regularly violated. So much so that the national and international agreements that were signed on August 12 and 14, 1990, between our governments and yours, which guaranteed all those rights presently denied.

"Those agreements were broken by Canada and Quebec as witnessed by the international observers who were selected by your own governments.

"Your governments promised that when the Mercier Bridge was opened and all barricades at Kahnawake and Kanehsatake were removed, discussions regarding our long term grievances would begin. They lied. Our people opened the roads and cleared the bridge, yet no discussions are underway.

"Your army promised that once the roads were opened and the bridge was cleared at Kahnawake they would move no further on our territory. They lied. Since that time they have violated our Sacred Longhouse, beaten our women, urinated on our children, ... our entire territory and last night fired weapons and tear gas, and beat unarmed people.

"Your government told the European parliament, (who strongly denounced your leaderships' role in this crisis), that they are meeting with our representatives to and this stalemate. Once again they have lied. No such meetings have occurred.

"Simply put, your government has turned over the voice of its people to soldiers, who are unaccountable to anyone. Do you wonder why we cannot believe or trust Prime Minister Mulroney or Premier Bourassa.

"Make no mistake about it, we behind the barbed wire are willing to lay down our weapons and to enter into a trusteeship as the process to resolve our long term complaints is initiated. We have never demanded anything, nor do we now, before we take this first step.

"All that we ask is for a process and not promises. All that we have ever received is promises and not action. This process, however, must begin at the same time as this disengagement.

de Klerk takes his case to Congress

South African president serious about commitment

WASHINGTON (AP) — South African President F.W. de Klerk is seeking to convince congressional leaders that he is serious about his commitment to establish a non-racial system in his country.

De Klerk planned meetings this morning with Senate leaders and, after an appearance at the National Press Club, a visit with House members.

Part of de Klerk's mission is to persuade Americans that his goal of dismantling apartheid is irreversible. But some Black activists said they are not yet convinced.

The 24-member Congressional Black Caucus canceled a meeting it had scheduled with de Klerk because it feared the session could misinterpreted.

After de Klerk's meeting Monday with President Bush, Randall Robinson, head of the TransAfrica anti-apartheid group, said the two leaders' meeting sent a "false and dangerous message" that South Africa is on its way to change.

De Klerk, meanwhile, assured Bush that the process of democratic reform cannot be reversed.

"We will not turn back," he said, promising a new system in which all South Africans will have a "vote of equal value."

Bush, in turn, hailed the "dramatic progress" away from apartheid rule in South Africa.

"Clearly, the time has come to encourage and assist the emerging new South Africa," Bush said after his two and a-half hour session with de Klerk.

Behind the leaders, a Black Marine held the flag of the South African and a White Marine held the American flag.

It was just a year ago that de Klerk assumed the South African presidency, a time when U.S.-South African relations were still frosty because of the negligible progress toward ending White rule.

U.N. Security Council votes to impose air embargo against Iraq in retaliation

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — The U.N. Security Council on Tuesday voted 14-1 to impose an air embargo against Iraq in retaliation for its invasion and annexation of Kuwait. Cuba cast the lone dissenting vote in the special session, which extended the powers of an earlier U.N. trade embargo.

It was the ninth resolution passed by the Security Council condemning Baghdad and its leader, Saddam Hussein, for its blitzkrieg of Kuwait. The lightening Kuwaiti takeover, which too hours to complete, left Iraq in control of 20 percent of the world's oil reserves.

World prices of oil have nearly doubled since the invasion to almost $40 a barrel, the New York Stock Exchange has sunk to a 14-month low and gold has passed $400 an ounce as the economic repercussions of the invasion became apparent.

Crude oil prices are equal to a record set 10 years ago.

The Security Council late Tuesday afternoon voted 14-1 to impose an air embargo against Iraq, cutting off flights to and from that nation and occupied Kuwait.

Resolutin 670 also calls on all member states of the United Nations to deny landing rights to airplanes coming from Iraq or Kuwait.

Only flights authorized by the Security Council's sanctions committee will be allowed to go to Iraq and Kuwait, and then only after they have been inspected to confirm they are carrying humanitarian cargo — food or medical supplies.

It also calls on all U.N. member nations to "detain any ships of Iraqi registry which enter their ports and which are being or have been used in violation of Resolution 661," the council's oil embargo resolution passed Aug. 6.

Cuba, which has said it is against any sanctions, was the only nation to oppose the resolution.

Secretary of State James A. Baker III represented the United States at the council meeting, and soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze took his country's seat and chaired the meeting.

Shevardnadze joined an international chorus of rage and indignation at Iraq earlier Tuesday, calling its invasion of Kuwait an "act of terrorism" and warning of possible U.N. military action.

He warned: "A great war may break out in the gulf region any day, any moment."

In another development, President Saddam said in a message to Americans broadcast Tuesday that President bush was sending Americans to a war more terrible than Vietnam.

In a 75-minute address taped last week, Saddam warned that if Bush were to launch war against Iraq, "It would not be up to him to end it."

World Bank to help resettle Gulf refugees

WASHINGTON (AP)— The World Bank is moving to help people and governments suffering from the Persian Gulf crisis, announcing a program to help resettle hundreds of thousands of refugees from Iraq and Kuwait.

"The bank is not a relief agency," bank President Barber Conable said Monday, "but we can help with financing and providing housing."

He said at a news conference the refugee workers — who had traveled to Iraq and Kuwait from other countries to find jobs — could contribute to the economies of their homelands. "Obviously they're aggressive and skilled workers or they wouldn't be there," he said.

Conable said the bank, which lends $20 billion a year to developing countries, also can take other steps. These include speeding up existing loan programs for countries affected by rising oil prices and other results of Iraq's takeover of Kuwait.

Conable's announcement at the end of a closed-door meeting of world finance ministers followed a decision by the World Bank's sister institution, the International Monetary Fund, to supply billions of dollars to poor countries harmed by the Middle East standoff.

The Persian Gulf crisis has become the central focus of the annual meetings of the IMF and the World bank, being attended by representatives of 152 member nations.

President Bush planned to address the finance officials this afternoon.

For the first time, a delegation from the Soviet Union was attending as "special invites." Soviet representatives were not in the closed-door, policy making meetings Monday, but were being seated at plenary sessions today and Wednesday.

Soviet officials have said informally they want to join all major international lending institutions, but the United States has always opposed Soviet membership in the world Bank or the IMF.

Conable said the bank does not assess the degree of democracy practiced in countries.

TANGELO PIE
By TIM SNIFFEN

Hi, is this Marcus' Mom? This is his roommate, Gabe. I just called to say Marcus is trying to get into this frat, and he might be doing things like, oh, pretending to call you from jail...
What? You spoke with him? Oh. So you know. Funny situation, isn't it? Ha ha.
But I'm sure it will all be taken care— what? Just one question? Ok, shoot.
yes, I'm giving it back.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Beware of a fast talker who has little to offer. Use restraint and diplomacy when others oppose your ideas. A relationship needs time to mature. Wait a while before asking for a commitment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Take stock of your weaknesses and strengths. Stop letting little things upset you. Recycle old ideas to supplement your income. Enrolling in high-tech courses boosts your earning power.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Good news sends your spirits soaring. Contact with old friends or a former employer could reveal new career options. Your desire to be the center of attention could make you appear pushy.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Your creative tastes and psychological insights are important assets. Something in the mail could make you happy. Give work your best shot. Postpone daydreaming. Romance looks super!

LEO (July 23-Aug 22) Many of you are aware of positive, perhaps dramatic changes in the works. Romance, friendship and travel prove important to upcoming trends. Be practical and guard against overspending.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22) Partnerships receive a welcome boost today. Talks are constructive. Those in positions of influence are receptive to your ideas. Follow up on a stockmarket tip and you get lucky!

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22) A tense situation comes to a head. A tactful approach can effectively quell volatile people. You feel drawn to someone you meet under unusual circumstances. Look before you leap.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21) A very lucky day lies ahead. Plan to take advantage of it. A friend or group may help you further your goals. Someone with outstretched hands could be irresponsible. Avoid lending money.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21) Research, organized effort and serious thinking are required. Be diplomatic if you are interrupted. You are more open to the initiatives of others now. A romantic relationship deepens.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19) Playing your hunch with an investment could stir up dissension. Avoid making impulsive purchases. A romantic urge is very compelling. The rapport that you two feel is simply electric!

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb 18) Banish any defeatist thoughts today. Distractions could interfere with work progress. Unexpected developments call for flexibility. Be ready to make quick decisions.

PISCES (Feb 19-March 20) You wade through a thicket of paperwork, phone calls and errands today. Talks with advisers are quite productive. A friend in a different profession offers some sage advice.

strength everywhere. We've got to watch out for Mara [Frattasio] up front, Sherlan [Cabralis] in the middle, and Scott in goal."

"We can't get discouraged," Hesler said. "It's hockey, it's a flukey game. A cheap goal here, or a fluke goal there. You never know what may happen. It will be a good game. We're looking forward to coming up."

FIELD HOCKEY NOTES: The NCAA rankings came out yesterday. The top 10 teams are as follows: 1. North Carolina, 2. Old Dominion, 3. Northwestern, 4. Northeastern, 5. Virginia, 6. Iowa, 7. Temple, 8. UMass, 9. Penn State, 10. Providence. THE A-10: A quick look at the Atlantic 10 standings show that UMass and Temple are tied for first with 1-0 records.

Penn State has yet to play a game in the A-10, but the Lions do have a 5-1 record.

Temple is 6-2, Rutgers is 5-3-1, Rhode Island is 3-2-1, and St. Joe's is 2-3-1.

SCORING LEADERS: Jane Catanzaro has turned the scoring race into nothing more than a race for second. The forward from Temple has 27 goals in eight games.

Scott leads all goalkeepers with a 0.17 goals against average.

Volleyball surprises in loss to Brown

Bruins hold off UMass surge

by FELICE COHEN
Collegian Correspondant

It was so close you could taste it.

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team played three close matches out of four against Brown, last night at Totman, but lost.

The Minutewomen, now 2-9, lost the first match 2-15, and it seemed to all, especially to Brown, that the night's work would be a piece of cake.

But the Bruins, decked out in brown and white uniforms, soon realized that this was not going to be that easy.

Said UMass coach Carol Ford, "It's not unusual for us to lose the first game. We still have little confidence and are a little tentative, because we are mostly rookies."

But the rookies surprised everyone and did a great job in the next three games. The Minutewomen came out hungry in the second game and jumped ahead 4-0. After some incredible volleys, they won the game 15-11.

Surprise, surprise.

Still in shock, Brown watched UMass climb ahead again in game three to a lead of 6-0. But Brown soon got its act together and won the next two matches 15-10, 15-10.

"We are improving so much. It's only a matter of time for things to come together," said Ford.

"I was very happy with the game," said Ford. "It was good for us. I saw improvement in all areas of our game."

Ford noted specifically the play of freshman Cathy Smith and sophomore Sharon Panoff, who had "a great night in middle, both on offense and defense with some great blocks" said Ford.

UMass had a total of ten blocks.

Senior Nancy Sullivan played her best match of the season, said Ford. Sullivan's serves were strong, though inconsistent at times; the serves she does get in usually come over the net at incredible speed.

"She is a power player both on offense and defense, but she is an inconsistent server," said Ford.

Watching the lead swing from the UMass side to the visitor side was frustrating. "To play that grade and to make rookie mistakes is hard to watch,' said Ford.

But the crowd didn't seem to notice.

And there were plenty of those.

"One guarantee," said Ford, smiling, "We may not be winning, but our matches are exciting and fun to watch.

"One of these days it will happen, I know it will."

Patriots owner denies making derogatory remark

NEW YORK (AP) — New England Patriots owner Victor Kiam denied Tuesday making a derogatory remark about a female reporter who had accused several team members of sexual harassment.

Several newspapers reported Monday that Kiam referred to Lisa Olson of the Boston Herald as a "classic bitch" while both were in the Patriots' locker room after Cincinnati's 41-7 victory Sunday. The remark reportedly was made to friends standing near Kiam.

"I did indicate that the young lady was aggressive," he told reporters covering a meeting of NFL owners Tuesday, "but I wouldn't have used that word in any case and I was standing next to the president of a religious institution and I certainly wouldn't use those words in front of a religious man like that.

"I even warned the man that we were going to the locker room and he might hear some rough language in there."

Kiam's quote was printed Monday in several newspapers, including the Herald, Boston Globe, Patriot Ledger of Quincy and Brockton Enterprise. It was heard by at least three reporters, one of whom confirmed the wording Tuesday.

NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue was non-committal Tuesday about whether the league would take action.

"I've been briefed," he said. "I don't really have all the facts so I don't want to comment because I'm not all clear what has happened."

Olson said that on Sept. 17, a practice day, she was interviewing New England defensive back Maurice Hurst at his locker. Tight end Zeke Mowatt stood close to her, exposed himself and make lewd remarks, she added.

She said other players made similar comments but she was too upset to look up and identify them. The Herald said five players were involved.

Top 50 recruit commits

N.J. star was wooed by Syracuse, ACC schools

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Louis Roe of Atlantic City, N.J., who has broken two backboards on dunks in the last two years, announced that he will sign a letter-of-intent with the University of Massachusetts in November.

Roe, 6-foot-8 and 200 pounds, is considered one of the top 50 high school players in the country by several scouting services, including Bob Gibbons' Basketball Report. He was recruited originally by over 150 schools, and narrowed his choices to Syracuse, UMass and James Madison before announcing his final decision Monday.

"When you let him loose, anything can happen," said Joe Fussner, Roe's coach at Atlantic City High School. "But he can play very much under control too.

"He's the type of athlete that can do almost anything he is asked."

Roe broke a backboard last summer on a "routine" offensive rebound, described Fussner. "Next thing we knew, glass was on the floor."

As a junior, Roe averaged 22.5 points, 12.5 rebounds and four blocked shots per game for Atlantic City High School, which finished 19-6.

Atlantic City High also produced Willie Glass, who starred at St. John's, and Bobby Martin, who Minuteman coach John Calipari recruited to Pittsburgh while an assistant coach there.

Roe joins 6-foot-9 Scott Drapeau of Concord, N.H. as early recruits to UMass for the 1991-92 season. Both are seniors in high school and will attend UMass next fall, pending admission to the University.

Minutewomen field hockey tests streak against Yale

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Today at Totman Field (3 p.m.), the eighth ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team plays host to the pride of New Haven, Yale University.

The Minutewomen are coming off of their best week of the season, with wins over Providence and Rutgers. Their winning streak has reached four games.

UMass is Yale's toughest test of the season. Yale, 1-3, has had difficulties putting the ball in the net, and stopping it from going in. They have been out scored 10-4 in their four games.

The Bulldogs have been practicing hard for UMass, according to Yale coach Carla Hesler. "We've been working on basics," Hesler said.

The Bulldogs look to Anne Lehman for goal scoring. The sophomore forward, who received Ivy League honorable mention honors last season, has two goals thus far. "Anne is our best player, she's really playing well," Hesler said.

Hesler also realizes that if her team is to have any chance of beating UMass, it needs to put one past UMass goalie Philippa Scott, who has five shutouts in six games.

"Scott is very aggressive, she clears the ball out very well. If we get down there, we want to shoot from further out, because she will come out of her net and clear the ball very far," Hesler said.

Jen Groeber, a first year varsity player, starts in goal for the Bulldogs. Groeber has started all four games for Yale and has accumulated a 2.50 goals against average.

"Jen [Groeber] has had a lot of shots on her," Hesler said. "She's not a top caliber goalie but she has improved game by game. She'll make the first and second save, but the third and fourth shots are the ones that get by her. She shouldn't have to make those third and fourth saves, the defense should clear the ball. The defense needs to play a tougher game."

The problem with a game like this for UMass is overconfidence. Last year UMass beat Yale 4-1, but later in the season against an inferior Dartmouth team, the Minutewomen waited until overtime to dispose of the Big Green 2-0.

"We have nothing to lose," Hesler said. "UMass has

Red Sox lose again, 5-2

BOSTON (AP) — Greg Swindell scattered seven hits in eight innings, Sandy Alomar homered and the Cleveland Indians dealt Boston's pennant hopes another jolt Tuesday night with a 5-2 victory over the staggering Red Sox.

Boston began the evening 1½ games behind Toronto, which played in Milwaukee. The Red Sox suffered their third consecutive defeat and 15th in 21 games. Boston and Toronto both have eight games remaining, including a three-game series at Fenway Park this weekend.

Swindell (12-8) unbeaten since Aug. 31 but just 2-0 in five starts this month, was in command except for Tony Pena's two-run homer. The left-hander struck out six and didn't issue a walk. Doug Jones pitched a one-hit ninth for his 41st save.

The Indians ripped Boston's Greg Harris (13-9) and relievers Larry Andersen and Wes Gardner for 10 hits, including Alomar's ninth homer.

Every Cleveland starter except Carlos Baerga had at least one hit as the Indians won for the 11th time in the last 13 games.

Cleveland went ahead with a run in the third on a walk, Felix Fermin's sacrifice, Alex Cole's infield hit and Jerry Browne's sacrifice fly. Alomar made it 2-0 with his homer into the left-field screen in the fourth and the Indians added a run in the fifth on a walk, a single by Cole and Browne's RBI grounder.

The Red Sox pulled within 3-2 in the fifth on Dwight Evans' single and Pena's homer, his seventh of the year and first since Aug. 7.

The Indians rebounded quickly, shelling Harris in a two-run sixth. With one out, Alomar singled and took second of Bearga's long fly. Brook Jacoby followed with an RBI single and Turner Ward's single chased Harris.

Education suffers more cuts

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff
and The Associated Press

Gov. Dukakis ordered a third 4 percent across-the-board cut to public higher education yesterday as part of the $330 million state budget reduction proposed last Tuesday.

All state agencies also received 4 percent across-the-board cuts by the Executive Office of Administration and Finance. Yesterday's cut comes on top of approximately $400 million in cuts already ordered this year.

The cuts were extracted directly from the computer accounts of all public universities, state and community colleges and will not be reappropriated by the Board of Regents of Higher Education, said Terry Zoulas, spokesman for the regents.

The total operating budget of public universities, state and community colleges administered by the regents was reduced by $25 million. The state-allocated budget of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst was cut by approximately $5.5 million.

"Massachusetts is in a severe economic recession," said President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey. "To pretend otherwise is to ignore reality."

The Legislature passed a $13.4 billion budget in July after imposing across-the-board cuts that totaled approximately $260 million. Then, on Sept. 4, Dukakis ordered $154 million more cuts due to a lingering shortfall in tax collections. A portion of the September cut will come from public higher education scholarship funds.

"It seems that our economic downward spiral is now on a three- week cycle," said Student Trustee Angus McQuilken. "The Governor promised [the Student Advisory Council to the Board of Regents] last Friday no more across-the-board cuts and he lied."

The Student Advisory Council is composed of student trustees and student government presidents from public universities and colleges. The council met with Dukakis to discuss how the budget cuts have affected public higher education.

Duffey said University administrators were "stunned" by yesterday's news. They had just finished planning campus reductions to compensate for the July and September cuts when yesterday's cut was announced, he said.

Administrators will have to make new decisions and test options over the next several days for reducing campus expenditures to meet the budget loss, he said.

Duffey said in the past he has alluded to the University's budget problems to being like "a great tree that has been cut to examine the rings for signs of fire and drought." Now, after yesterday's cut, he said he had to change his analogy.

"UMass is a plant that has been hacked, chopped, trampled upon and cut," he said. "The question now is to try and keep it alive."

Dukakis enacted the $310 million cut after speaking with Wall Street bond analysts who have given Massachusetts the worst credit ratings in the country.

Dukakis said Tuesday he was making further cuts because of gloomy economic forecasts for the state and the

The situation in the Middle East is highly volatile and the continuing U.S. military presence is resented by Arabs, according to political science and economics professors who held a debate last night at Smith College.

Smith College Economics Professor Karen Pfeifer said that the primary issue behind the present Middle East crisis is the question of which Arab country should control the oil reserves.

She said that the Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait was partially a response to the economic depression in Iraq caused by the substantial decrease in the world oil prices in the 1980s.

Pfeifer added that Arab world unanimously resents the U.S. military intervention in the Middle East.

Police investigating Sutton accident

Injured basketball star may have been running from fight

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Amherst police are investigating the possibility that former University of Massachusetts basketball star Lorenzo Sutton was involved in an altercation just before being struck by a car last Sunday morning, according to a police spokesperson.

Sutton remained in critical condition yesterday at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield as a result of head injuries he sustained in the accident.

Police said the woman who drove the car which struck Sutton was Jean Kokoszka, 21, a junior at UMass who lives at Mill Valley Estates. She was cited later Sunday morning for leaving the scene of a personal injury accident and operating to endanger.

She later called police and admitted her involvement in the incident. She will be arraigned in Northampton District Court.

A police spokesperson said yesterday a man who was with Sutton at the time of the altercation will be brought in for questioning on the incident.

The spokesperson said police are investigating the theory that Sutton was being chased at the time he was struck in the traveler's lane of North Pleasant Street shortly after 2:15 a.m. Sunday.

Sutton graduated from the University two years ago with a degree in interior design.

Vigil held to protest cuts to Everywoman's Center

Students join to defend 'lifeblood service'

By GREG SUKIENNIK

BY THE CANDLELIGHT — Natasha Diephuis rallies to save the Everywoman's Center from more detrimental cuts to its programs last night at the Student Union steps.

Some 125 students attended a candlelight vigil last night in a show of support for Everywoman's Center in the face of additional funding cuts to the Center.

The gathering was in response to budget cuts levied on EWC by Dennis Madson, vice chancellor of Student Affairs. Madson cut the Counseling Program and the Public Relations and Outreach Program when state budget cuts prompted a $440,000 reduction in Student Affairs spending.

With this latest round of cuts, the Center has now lost two-thirds of the services it offered three years ago. According to Sara Lyons, executive officer of the Graduate Student Senate, EWC has been targeted with 25 percent of Student Affairs' 5 percent cut in spending.

Natasha Diephuis, Student Government Association president, told the gathered crowd that a meeting with Madson produced some understanding about policy regarding possible future cuts, but made no headway in restoring what was lost already.

"He sounded willing, but also said that the transfers in staff were non-negotiable," said Diephuis. "We find this to be totally unacceptable."

Other speakers included Ali Woolwich and Maggie Magner. Magner stressed that preserving EWC was a matter of priority. "This is a lifeblood service, and [Madson] has to know this."

Several students, men and women alike, indicated through interviews that they felt EWC was vital to the University. One student, who asked to remain anonymous, explained that the recently-cut Counseling Program helped her when she was raped two semesters ago.

"I was alone and scared — it was the lowest point in my life," she said. "And EWC sent me an advocate. It made all the difference to me. And now they've cut Counseling. That's evil."

Recruiters portray UMass 'a great value'

By MAURA CANAVAN
Collegian Correspondent

This fall admissions representatives armed with University of Massachusetts pencils, pennants and T-shirts will visit over 24 college fairs and 350 high schools around the country in addition to mailing postcards signed by staff members.

For the first time this semester the Undergraduate Admissions Office has experienced a shortage of potential students, requiring new tactics to entice students to the UMass.

"We are in a buyer's market," says Timm Rinehart, director of Undergraduate Admissions.

There are a number of reasons for this recent decline in enrollment, such as the decreasing number of college-age students, the suffering reputation of the University from state budget cuts and the increasing costs of tuition and fees, Rinehart said.

"We want to turn around the negative publicity and remind people that we're still a great value," he said.

Confronted with these recent demographical changes and state budget problems, UMass began recruiting at high school college fairs this past spring. Concentrating on the fall freshman class of 1991, UMass sent out summer introductory mailings using a computerized inquiry file.

"What we have to do is some new things and do the things we have been doing, better. So it's basically more and better, to keep up with the competition and bring in the students," Rinehart said.

There will be four open houses in October at the University and student volunteers will be available for private information sessions. Student tours will be given each day of the week and admission representatives will be available for information sessions.

"We are trying to show off our best feature, which is our campus," he said.

A reception will be held for minority students on Nov. 5 and 12 at the Boston Public Library.

Earlier this month, UMass held a fall open house for high-school guidance counselors. Ninety guidance counselors came from across the state. Presentations were given by the Provost, the Dean of Students, the Financial Aid Director and the Five College Coordinator.

The Admissions Office is also concentrating its efforts on "stage two" of the recruitment process. Rinehart said, "We need to continue going after the accepted students as well."

Faculty from selected schools such as the College of Engineering and the Department of Food Science and Nutrition will make congratulatory phone calls to accepted students, he said. In addition, alumni will also call accepted students.

Special programs will be held for accepted students on Fridays and Saturdays and more merit scholarships will be offered to talented students.

"We are trying to personalize the process," Rinehart said.

"We are also asking a wider group of people to help, such as faculty, students and alumni."

He said the recruitment process is now more personal, offering "close student-student and faculty-student interaction."

"We need as many students as we can get now," said Rinehart. "Two years ago I had to do a lot to keep numbers down."

Rinehart called the current nationwide recruitment of applicants by colleges and universities "slick marketing."

"We are in an arms race with all other institutions," he said.

Fraudulent telephone surveys distressing to students

A popular scam has surfaced again at the University – prank "survey" calling.

Several students have reported to the Collegian that a man, identifying himself as a staff member of this paper, called this week conducting a survey about attitudes and beliefs.

The man, who is possibly a student, asked a series of personal questions before advising the female Central resident who took the call to seek attention at a religious organization on campus.

"I could not tell if he was kidding or not," she said. "He told me that by participating in the survey I could win two tickets to Florida."

Meredith O'Brien, Collegian editor in chief, said no staff member conducted a survey this week. She said the paper has not conducted a survey this semester.

University police officials said prank survey calls are fairly common especially on weekend nights.

Mary Dumas, staff assistant with the Department of Public Safety, said these fake survey calls are fraudulently representing the psychology department or Health Services.

These departments, as all other departments on campus, have access to Project Pulse, a polling service operating out of the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office.

Julie Lam, associate director of SAREO, said her office conducts surveys only on Wednesday nights for five hours. She said surveyers, who make about 600 calls a night, identify themselves as employees of Project Pulse.

She added that if students are wary a supervisor will come on the line and give the student additional information.

University Police Det. Barry Flanders said he encourages students to hang up on a prank caller and not give the caller a sense of reaction.

"With a fairly young population like we have here the student may or may not know if the call is bogus until they note something glaring," he said.

He said if the caller is persistent to notify police.

Bombings in Puerto Rico to protest U.S. policies

By ELLIOT MONTEVERDE TORRES
Collegian Correspondent

This story is based on a report in the Sept. 17 issue of the Puerto Rican newspaper El Nuevo Dia.

Two explosive devices were detonated during the night of Sept. 17 at Arecibo's Citibank and an American industry in Vega Baja.

The explosions produced no substantial structural damages to buildings or injuries to people in the vicinity. The bombs were described as rudimentary by an unidentified police source.

The device that exploded at Arecibo's Citibank at Gonzalos Marin Avenue is believed to have been detonated shortly past midnight. Damages at the U.S.-owned Harvey Hubbell Industry were estimated at $5,000. Harvey Hubbell manufactures electric goods. It is not known whether the company, based in Bridgeport, CT, has any ties to the U.S. Army.

The Fuerza Armada Revolucionaria Pedro Albizu Campos has assumed responsibility for both attacks. The group's communique stated its opposition to the use of Puerto Rican troops in the Middle East as well as to a recent referendum that could decide Puerto Rico's political status internationally.

The FBI has commenced on an intensive investigation of the situation. The agency had reportedly conducted several interrogations by late afternoon. According to the FBI, the communique will be submitted to laboratory tests.

The revolutionary group contacted El Nuevo Dia and said that another reason why the attacks were carried out was to denounce the "recruitment of Puerto Ricans to the criminal Yankee army which seeks to defend corrupt kings while the people live in misery."

Mohawk conflict intensifies

Members of the Mohawk Nation came out of the Oka barricade, which they have occupied since July 11, unarmed yesterday to be greeted by soldiers bearing bayonets and rifles, in the continuing conflict between the two groups.

A scuffle broke out between the two groups in which several people were knocked down. Reporters were removed from the barricade area and arrested. They were also denied access to send stories of the conflict.

Several members of the Mohawk Nation, including women, children and reporters were arrested. Earlier this week, Jessie Jackson was denied entrance to the Oka barrier. Jackson held a press conference at the Kahnawake survival school, where he urged Mohawks to negotiate peacefully, but to keep up the fight for native civil rights.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Opinions printed in the Editorial/Opinion section of the Collegian, with the exception of this statement, do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Transportation troubles

There are few things in this world that REALLY annoy me.

People who hang up on our answering machine, customers refusing to tip their waitress (especially when the waitress happens to be me) and public transportation.

Not that I don't enjoy the convenience of public transportation, because I do. It is the ignorant people utilizing such means, that I could do without.

Erin Martin

Every day this summer, I rode the MBTA, a.k.a. the 'T.' For thirty dollars a month I enjoyed the "hassle-free" convenience of the green line from Cleveland Circle to Government Center. On hot, humid days, I packed into the trolley car, sweaty bodies pressed against me. Men stood close enough behind me they could read over my shoulder. Everyday was the re-creation of a television advertisement for Dial Soap. And there was many a day I had wished to recommend that other passengers try some.

Now that school is back in session, I enjoy the convenience and "hassle-free" ride of the PVTA, a.k.a. the 'bus.' As a veteran of the public transportation system (especially here at UMass), I would like to point out a few points of common courtesy that I thought were obvious. Stop me if I go too quickly.

Courtesy No. 1: No one wants to hear how drunk you got last night, who you scooped or how long you waited in line at Barcie's. The bus is quiet in the morning for a reason, most of us are still half asleep. So, unless you wish to broadcast your life story, talk softly or keep quiet.

Courtesy No. 2: If you elect to wear a walkman, to avoid the vocals from No. 1, please keep the volume down. There's a purpose to wearing earphones. There is nothing worse than hearing second-hand music through your neighbor's ear.

Courtesy No. 3: "Get out of the stepwell please!" Everyone knows you cannot stand in the stepwell. No matter how hard you try to hide, the driver CAN see you. Which means they aren't going to drive away. Instead, by standing in the stepwell, you are asking the driver to unhook his or her seatbelt, get off the bus, walk to the back and tell you personally that you can't ride in the stepwell. Meanwhile, the rest of us sigh in aggravation because you are making us late to class.

Courtesy No. 4: Take your backpacks off your shoulder.

Especially when you are standing in the aisle. The situation is not so bad right now, but on snowy and rainy days, when the bus is extremely crowded, backpacks become very annoying. They are always soaking wet, and the person behind you leaves for class with a wet book print on their chest. Besides, holding your books down below makes room for more passengers.

Courtesy No. 5: Personal space is fundamental. In elevators, in relationships, wherever, we are always looking for space. If you are standing in the aisle, move forward (or back). This allows less crowding in the front and back of the bus. Which makes for a much more pleasant ride for the rest of us.

Courtesy No. 6: The most obvious courtesy (and I can't believe people still do this) keep your books out of the seat next to you. Especially when you are sitting in the aisle seat. This is not eighth grade. Riding next to a stranger will not give you cooties. Even if you did promise your best friend you would save him or her a seat, it is ignorant and immature to not let someone else sit down next to you.

Courtesy No. 7: Don't ring the signal to stop once it has already been rung. The driver is most likely going to stop anyway. Two rings may be necessary for the driver to hear, but ten rings is going a bit overboard.

I hope that the prior list, which was compiled through the help of other passengers, has taught the ignorant few a lesson (or two). And as they say at the PVTA, "Happy Motoring."

Cuts from counseling devastating

I am furious. I'm sure that the root of my frustration goes back to the tiring yet important issue of budget cuts at this institution.

Institution. This word can lead me into my topic of discussion. I've been trying to make an appointment with Mental Health for the past month.

To give you a quick overview of the situation, I am not in need of immediate medical attention. I have been dealing with something in my past and have gone to counseling for a year now. I stopped for awhile but decided to continue this year since I became a Residential Assistant so that I would have someone to go to if things got stressful.

I've called every week and each time I am told to call back the following week. After four weeks, I decided to find another option: The Everywoman's Center. The day of my appointment they called me to confirm it. About four hours later, I arrived to hear that the center had just lost their money for the counseling program. Turned away again.

I am not in a desperate state. However, I do know that the initial step, admitting that you need counseling, is one of the most difficult decisions one can make. I knew I wasn't "crazy" but I was locked in the stereotype that if I was seeking help, something was wrong with me. If I had to hear, "We can't help you, try back another time," from a receptionist, I would have been devastated and probably would never have called back.

Where does this leave me? I am stranded again by the ominous presence of budget cuts, but this time it's more than asking for more money from my pocket — it's money they've already taken out. I have already paid for ten sessions with my basic health fee that I am charged every semester. The Escort Service was cut until women were raped — do we have to wait for some drastic mental rape before we get the services we deserve?

When coming West, leave East Coast attitude at home

People often ask me why I came to Massachusetts from California. Sometimes I smile and answer with various reasons: fall, school, change of attitude and climate, etc. But very rarely do I respond with the main motivating reason — that I wanted to take a Tocqueville journey to find out what makes New Englanders tick.

To take back anecdotes to my friends of little odd behaviors (pickles with maple syrup), but also to show that in a lot of ways, our coasts are not that different, although each coast perceives the differences as large.

My favorite example is the California north-south and the Massachusetts east-west "Where do you come from?" phenomenon. In California San Francisco is where the culture begins, from there north it is home to the last of the "true hippie free spirits" living the real California ethic and Southern Cal. is merely a bunch of bubble heads.

I think you get the comparison to here with Eastern Mass. as the tougher, real Mass. and the West as these earthy-crunchy do-gooders. I hope it gives you the same chuckle as it gives Californians when they ask me what the East Coast is like.

But one thing that we unfortunately differ on is something in which you people call "attitude." You see in California that it's not that we don't have it. Gangs use it as an unspoken language — called maddogging — to stare down or induce a gang fight with someone. Most other people just call it "uptight," though, and, ironically, follow it with "Where are they from, the East Coast?"

Sam Coleman

This place has an awful reputation in that sense because the number one ethic that a Californian has is that you should always, no matter who that person is — Black, gay, socially inept — make that person feel welcome and have some fun.

This takes on the form of sharing, be it food, drugs or even friends. You're just not a Californian if you give attitude because there is absolutely no need.

Now, I've had good luck here meeting people who embody that ethic, and I wish I could say all their names. But I recently had some acquaintances treat some friends (who were new to the area) with such snobbish elitism — they being the "cool" crowd and my other friends too mainstream — that it annihilated my conception that wonderful, p.c. NoHo and Amherst have much of a chance when it comes to getting real.

I can only hope that my final sentence about Massachusetts to people when I return back home will not be "But, you know, they always had this attitude thing going on."

My only advice is when traveling, leave this little trait at home where even there it doesn't belong.

Sam Coleman is a UMass exchange student

Television commercials not thought out in terms of culture

I'm not stewing, but I have a beef with the beef industry. Though their indiscretion may seem petty, it deserves scrutiny. Recently, they've been airing a spot on the radio to laud the healthful benefits of meat eating, which is in itself fine.

Nick Ostis

"Hi, this is Rasta Rib-I," intones a Jamaican-inflected voice over a hypnotizing reggae backbeat. Utilizing the catchy vernacular familiar to tourists of this island, the actor praises beef's virtues, and the commercial ends.

However, their sensitivity to the traditions of the Rastas is suspect. Perhaps no one in the advertising department is aware of the Rastas' dietary regimen.

The true Rastas, those who embrace the tenets of the faith, don't eat any flesh or even salt. They don't smoke tobacco or drink alcohol, for that matter.

So strict is their faith, in fact, they eschew mirrors, combs and scissors — inducements to ego gratification, I presume.

Imagine the furor in the Catholic community over a radio spot like this:

'Hi, I'm Father McCarthy (speaks with a brogue) here to tell you that there's nothing like a Brand X condom. Brand W just doesn't provide that feeling you're looking for. If you're seeking quality birth control and sexually transmitted disease protection, use the best. Enjoy."

Or, how about the snit among Kosher Jews for this one:

"Oy, Kosher Ken here. There's nothing like a bacon, lettuce and tomato sandwich with Piggy's Quality Pork Products. Raised on Ohio's fertile plains, these corn-fed porkers are tender and succulent."

People are eating less meat, so the beef industry is targeting a new generation or market. Business is business. One hopes though that they do their homework in the future.

Traditionally, America has been the leader in welcoming the world's people to her shores. The lifestyles which they lead serve to infuse society with fresh insight and perspective, to say nothing about the delights and stimulation of their art, music, food and philosophies. All these folks deserve respect for their beliefs.

To temper my sober judgment with some humor, here's an old tale you may find amusing. I say tale because the story may be apocryphal.

The Chevrolet Corporation learned a costly lesson some years back when their Nova model sold poorly in Latin America. I guess nobody thought about the inhabitants confusing Nova with "no va," which translates into "doesn't go."

Another time, I found myself in a spectacular Colombian sunrise. The focus was upon a large group of small well-scrubbed Colombian children. A trance-inducing narrator extolled the virtues of Colombian coffee on behalf of Maxwell House.

The bean of the truth is the coffee pickers work tortuously long hours for small change. They are undernourished, illiterate and live in pitiable squalor. Their children will inherit their parents' lives of indentured slavery.

The front-page photo of the Collegian Sept. 20 of Bill Weld bore a provoking caption: "Mass. Republican gubernatorial candidate William Weld speaks to a member of the masses."

I would be very greatly obliged if someone would tell me what "a member of the masses" means.

Is it someone from East Boston or Northampton?

Is it someone who wears a suit and tie?

Is it someone old or young?

Is it someone who prefers Bruce Willis' Die Hard to Laurie Anderson's, The Home of the Brave?

Is it someone who makes $15,000 a year as opposed to someone who makes $60,000?

The person speaking to Weld in the photo appeared (my assumption) to be a senior citizen of modest means.

I doubt that a 23-year-old graduate student at this University would be referred to as "a member of the masses."

Why is that?

Is it because the expression, like the Greek hoi polloi, carries with it a tone of implicit contempt?

Fed. budget follows our lead

Massachusetts is not the only governmental body sitting on the brink of economic disaster. The commonwealth has been joined by a much larger player, the Federal Government, whose leaders must get their budget chariot home through the compromise before Friday or the nation turns into a fiscal pumpkin.

Jason Kofman

Fiscal Year 1991 begins Oct. 1 and according to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction bill, unless the negotiations succeed, major indiscriminate program cuts automatically go into effect, which cripple the economy. What are Congressional and White House leaders doing about the impending 30 to 40 percent across-the-board cuts? Arguing.

The leadership factions from each party have come up with various proposals seeking to remedy the situation. Both sides agree on raising taxes on non-necessity items like tobacco, alcohol, life insurance policies, aviation and luxury goods, although that is where the similarity ends.

Democrats are backing a plan that would force the wealthy to absorb more of the tax burden and the military more of the cuts.

Republicans are advocating a plan that would lower capital gains tax along with other measures to stimulate the economy. Sounds familiar.

The Democratic plan may sound farfetched, but it is an attempt to force ourselves out of the budget debacle. It basically calls for a 20 percent budget surtax on the taxes owed by individuals with incomes over $125,000 and couples over $200,000.

The only discouraging plank is that it also calls for an increase of $50 million on gasoline and other energy products over the next five years, items that are increasingly seen as necessities like bread and clothes that lower-income people may not be able to afford if they are taxed too much higher.

The overall proposal is one that would do less to stimulate economic growth, but do more to lessen the deficit, which is what the whole fiasco is about anyway.

The Republican plan reads like a page right out of Reaganomics and supply-side economics. It calls for the lowering of the capital gains tax to less than 15 percent, tax breaks for oil and gas development along with $7 billion in energy taxes over five years and limiting state and local income tax payments that can be deducted from Federal tax returns.

These measures are supposed to free up capital for businesses and individuals to re-invest in the economy and thus spur the economy to new heights. If you recall the 1981 and 1982 tax cuts that were supposed to do the same thing, you may have noticed that they failed miserably and are most likely the major reason we are now in the middle of this big mess.

What does all this squabbling mean for us taxpayers? It means a major lack of government services if the cuts are forced into effect, encompassing the elimination of 1.4 million student loans and the reduction of 2 million more, thousands of lay-offs at IRS which would reduce the processing of returns, resulting in a loss of $2.8 billion, and the furloughing of flight inspectors, justice officials, health and social workers and civilian military personnel.

The only silver lining appears to be the 35 percent trimming of the defense budget, a cut that happens to be four times larger than the Democratic plan that President Bush has vowed to veto.

These impending cuts are threatening to ravage our already weakened economy, and it is up to our national leaders to reconcile their differences and produce a package that will save us from economic chaos.

There has been a lot of talk of being tough with the opposition and not giving into their demands. However, we are past the point of talking tough and now is the time where these tough guys must swallow their pride and work something out, or we will be facing tough times nobody can talk down.

What is a 'token minority?'

Ever heard of the term "token minority?" Its meaning is of special importance to those who consider Third World issues a priority.

"Token minority" usually refers to a "person of color" within the United States.

Minu Sebastian

How are "token minorities" different from some "people of color?" One of the primary criteria of "token minorities" is the manipulation of ethnicity to assimilate into the majority power structure. In order to assimilate they deny their cultural roots and as they see convenient use their ethnicity for personal gratification. They will suddenly show an interest in their native homeland when "diversity" becomes an issue.

"Token minorities" are doing gross injustices not only to people of their own race, but also to the intelligence of any thinking individual.

They live in their own naive and ideal world. They often believe that all people are the same. They live by the notion that all people regardless of race, ethnicity and culture should blend together in peace and happiness. They ignore history, the current structure of world power, and the current struggle of indigenous people throughout the world.

It is within this selfish and self-centered mentality that "token minorities" operate. They want to ignore the past and the present situation of their people. In America they romanticize about their country without any clear understanding about their native homeland.

What is most disgraceful is watching the utter audacity some of them have. They often walk around with a snobbish but insecure air hoping that nobody will notice their facade. They just want to be accepted; they just want to be liked.

When a topic of diversity comes up, they will jump at the chance to prove to themselves that they are aware of their identity. They manipulate the issue of diversity and identity so that it fits into their personal agendas.

"Token minorities" are symbols representing everything their native culture is not. They adopt the value system and mentality of the mainstream to be accepted, get further in their careers and obtain an image of status.

Through the eyes of those associated with Third World issues, "token minorities" are looked upon with utter disgust. Why?

Because they represent a lie. They lie to themselves and to the people around them. They sacrifice their own cultures and identities for personal gratification. They also devalue and trivialize the objectives of the Third World community.

People of the "majority community" might have the unfortunate impression that they might be able to learn something about a different culture through a "token minority." The most anyone can learn from a "token minority" is how to be confused, lost and selfish.

"Token minorities" halt any critical thought the "majority community" will give to issues concerning culture, history and identity. As a result people of the "majority community" will continue to conceptualize people of other cultural backgrounds under their own terms and mentality. All this causes is more chaos, confusion and frustration.

In essence, "token minority" is just what the term implies, an insignificant person who is not representative of the whole s/he is from. The situation becomes dangerous when people start to take them seriously.

"Token minorities" should be treated on the level of thinking and language that they can understand. They should be treated like naive and sheltered children. So go ahead, patronize them and pat them on the head. They'll love it.

In fact, you'll even see them running back for more.

Publicity-seekers waste paper

I find the waste of paper on this campus sickening. In biology class this morning, I counted 112 colored fliers about rushing Phi Sigma. Two large signs would have been infinitely more useful than many small ones that are difficult to read.

Phi Sigma is not the only one to advertise to excess. Other fraternities have spelled out their letters on the ground in paper, only to have these papers rip up and blow around campus. Whichever fraternity is "IT," it has littered the campus without regard to letting us learn where we can join this fine institution.

Fraternities are not the only ones to waste our natural resources. Today, as an Orchard Hill/Central resident, I received a letter from the UMass arts council about a park being built to memorialize William Smith Clark.

Yes, upon seeing construction I would be curious about what is being built, but this same notice appears to have been posted in other public spaces (in my dorm, anyway).

Not only does this waste the University's money for paper, but it requires labor to mail these letters and to take public notices down.

I call upon all organizations to think twice about what they put up around campus. Consider an attractive, readable design on white or unbleached paper. Colored paper may stand out a small amount, but it is not as good for our environment.

IRA's terror begets more terror

I too was at the meeting last Tuesday in the Campus Center where the speaker was Mary Nelis — a member of Sinn Fein. I too listened to her speech but, although I respect her views, I totally disagree with her.

Never once did she mention the level of intimidation that the IRA forces upon the population of Northern Ireland and the members of Her Majesties forces throughout Europe. Not once did she mention the source of the munition and explosives that the IRA uses — namely Libya.

Nelis, and the rest of the supporters of the IRA, object when their homes are searched and their sons arrested. She stated that not once were any arms or explosives found in her house and so she can see no reason for the searches of her house. And yet, by her own admission, her sons are members of the terrorist organization — I would have thought that a very good reason for her house to be under such close scrutiny.

The reporter obviously fails to have a real grasp for the situation in Northern Ireland. He accurately reports that her sons are imprisoned in terrible conditions, but fails to point out to the reader that it was by their own choice. Her sons — and other convicted members of the IRA — refused to wear prison uniforms and as a result were confined to solitary confinement. I would point out that this is normal practice not only in all British prisons, but also in American prisons.

My basic argument with the IRA is that they are a terrorist organization which doesn't care who gets killed or maimed if they just happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. They call the trouble in Northern Ireland a war, and yet when the roles of war are engaged against them they scream "foul."

The only way to get the British forces out of Northern Ireland is to stop this level of violence. If the British could find a way out of Northern Ireland, they would. But if they left tomorrow, there would be a blood bath between the IRA and the Loyalists. The role may be reversed, with the Loyalists becoming the terrorists fighting for a separate Northern Ireland as part of Britain.

It costs too much for the British to stay in Northern Ireland, in money, but, more importantly, in blood — English and Irish.

is great," she said. "This leads me to think how successful the intervention can be."

Hormoz Shahdadi, political science professor at Mount Holyoke College, said that Iraq's primary interest is the attainment of a warm sea port.

He added that the ultimate and unintentional element in the gamble of the Middle East is Islam, and this factor will unify the Arab world against the United States.

"The massive use of [U.S.] force would have worked if the alternative of Islam was not there," he said. "The mere presence of American forces has made the Muslims in the region restless."

According to Shahdadi, the motivating factor behind U.S. military intervention is the "international, capitalist and unfair law" which says that "you don't rob your rich neighbor."

Vincent Ferraro, political science professor at Mount Holyoke College, said that U.S. foreign policy towards Middle East is motivated by the need to assure Israel's security as well as a secure oil supply.

"U.S. could be in war at any minute," said PAWSS coordinator Michael Klare. "Starting tonight."

This was the second panel discussion in a series of events scheduled by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies.

The cuts also eliminated state fuel assistance subsidy for low-income residents and eliminated a general relief category for people over 45 who lack significant work history. The plans will also close soldiers' homes in Chelsea and Holyoke and place residents in alternative long-term care facilities.

It is refreshing to once again see the rather short attention span of the U.S. media focus on the continuing struggle in the Philippines through a recent film review in a campus publication.

The Rustling of the Leaves which was screened in the Valley last week provided a rare insider's view of the Philippine revolution. However, as someone who once worked full time for the Legal Left portrayed in the film, I would like to present a different point of view.

I disagree with the description of the Filipinos as a "peaceloving people so torn by poverty and injustices that they are left no choice but to fight among themselves."

It is true that Filipinos are fighting Filipinos, but the question is why? Some of the most notorious violators of human rights in the Philippines today are vigilante groups like Alsa Masa, and the Tadtad (or "Chop-chop") who were shown in the film in gory detail chopping off the heads of suspected rebels.

Who supported the rise of the Alsa Masa? In May 1987, former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark reported that the Alsa Masa was created during the visit of retired U.S. General John Singlaub to the Philippines when he encouraged the formation of such 'death squads' as part of the counter-insurgency campaign.

The most recent evidence of the U.S. military's hand in getting us to fight among ourselves is a recently leaked document from the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

The document refers to a counter-insurgency plan named Jericho, initiated and implemented with the cooperation of the Joint U.S. Military Advisory Group. This document includes a "Memorandum of Agreement Between the DND (Dept. of National Defense, Philippines) and JUSMAG Regarding Civilian Participation in COIN (Counter Insurgency) Operations in Rural Areas."

The civilian participation refers to the formation of paramilitary groups like the Alsa Masa to carry out dirty operations like death squad operations on behalf of the military.

Secondly, the document includes the "Letter of the Chief, JUSMAG, Approving the Request of the DND for the 4 Year Detail of 25 Social Engineer Specialists to the AFP." These social engineers are simply U.S. psychological operations (psy-ops) experts that train Filipinos in psy-ops of the Jun Pala type.

Jose Ledesma

Finally, the mission stated in this document was "i. Backup Op-Plan Sunset and Op-Plan Ivory; ii. Undercut the CT Peace Initiative; iii. Preempt CT anti-bases bid; iv. Take steps to improve psy-ops credibility."

Op-Plans Sunset and Ivory are simply plans to carry out liquidations of all rebel affiliates in urban areas. Undercutting the Communist Peace Initiative (CT) involves discrediting the rebel proposal to call a unilateral cease fire and begin peace negotiations in exchange for the withdrawal of the U.S. bases. Here, the U.S. military and their cohorts in the Philippines were undermining the possible peaceful and reasonable resolution of the bloody conflict in the Philippines.

It may also be noted that the recent U.S. offer of a 10-year phase-out of the bases is just a strategy to buy time in order that a military government come in and squash the growing anti-bases movement sweeping the Philippines.

One scenario is the election of General Fidel Ramos (the West Point educated Defense Minister) as President, thus installing a military government via the ballot box. Already, business groups are mentioning him as a possible 1992 presidential candidate.

Of course, if this option fails, the U.S can always support a military coup. It is not by coincidence that the first major military coup in 1987 occurred a week after the Philippine Senate introduced a bill banning nuclear weapons on U.S. bases.

Interestingly, a recent coup occurred just on the eve of negotiations on the future of these bases. The majority of the Senate has already declared that they will not renew the bases treaty and a successful military coup will override such legislative obstacles to the continued stay of the bases.

What are the methods being used to achieve these objectives? One strategy is to intensify the psy-ops war and conduct military operations against anti-bases personalities, both legal and underground, then blame the killings on factional rivalries.

This sinister plan is explicitly spelled out in the document and leaves no doubt as to who is making Filipinos fight Filipinos. Even the "centrist" Aquino partisans and the right wing coup plotters are being manipulated to fight each other so as to eventually promote U.S. interests.

Even as the U.S flew jets over Manila to save Aquino's puppet regime, the CIA had maintained covert ties to the military coup plotters. In 1986 the U.S. supported both Marcos and Aquino until it became clear who could better avert a communist-led takeover that would jeopardize the future of the bases.

If Filipinos are fighting each other, we must get to the root cause of why we are fighting each other and remove this cancer from our society. We must see who is making Filipinos fight Filipinos, Arabs fight Arabs, Inkatha Zulus fight the ANC, etc.

It is time that Third World people unite against U.S imperialism (which is not the same as the people of the U.S.) and smash all structures that divide, conquer and oppress the majority of the world's peoples.

The Gulf Crisis and Israel's territorial ambitions

The recent events in the Persian Gulf have eclipsed in the media the crisis in Israel. The Intifada has been marginalized by the media. No more pictures of Israeli soldiers firing on women and children. Fortune has smiled upon Israel.

Robin Varghese

But as most U.S. minds wander from issue to issue, those of us who for some time have worked with or supported the principle victims of the state of Israel wonder: what of the Palestinians?

From the vantage point of the Palestinian struggle, this impending war and the aftermath of a U.S. victory constitute perhaps one of the darkest hours in its history, for Israel has been given an environment to begin executing what thus far it had only dared whisper — namely, transfer.

For some time now, voices of sanity at this University have tried to depict the plight of the Palestinians and the struggle between a Palestinian David and an Israeli Goliath.

It has been noted time and time again that this disinherited people, after having made compromise upon compromise, have yielded from Israel nothing but the usurpation of their culture, the theft of their land and the barrel of an Israeli gun.

Yes, these sins can be found in other nations; but where Israel stands nearly alone, what is most frightening about this inhuman experience, is that the most moral justifications are posited for some of the most heinous acts in modern history.

How many Palestinians have been dispossessed in the name of national liberation? How many civilians have been tortured in the name of justice? How many children have been killed in the name of an end to all oppression? How many fundamental articles of human rights have been violated in the name of democracy? And what crimes remain to be committed in the name of morality?

When the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan resulted in the displacement of one-third of the Afghan population into Pakistan and Iran, it was labeled 'migratory genocide.' In Palestine, such a displacement occurred in 1948 and continues to the present.

What is to be feared in the crisis of Palestine is that Israel, like the U.S. and most settler-colonial states, will eventually execute real, not migratory, genocide.

Hopefully it will not come to this, but rest assured that if it does, Israel will create the most moral justifications for it.

Robin Varghese is a UMass student.

Fax Americana?

It is time, we are told, to break out the champagne and confetti in celebration of a "new world order," a regime where "the rule of the law will replace the rule of the jungle" and in which the goal of collective security will be realized.

Thoughtful people, however, might be tempted to let the dust gather on the Dom Perignon for just a little while longer. For the "new world order" is based on the cooperation of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council under the leadership of the U.S. Surely this is what is meant by beaming U.S. diplomats who announce that, now, the U.N. is working "as it was originally designed to" (as a tool of U.S. foreign policy).

Hussein Ibish

The long-term success of this Security Council based system is highly unlikely. It is a loose coalition at best, based on a most unusual set of circumstances, unmanageable in the long run.

What will happen to it when China feels its national interests at stake in a future conflict? What is the role of moderate powers such as India, Pakistan, and Brazil, not to mention Iran and Iraq? For example, what will be the role of the "new world order" if India and Pakistan were to come to hostilities over Kashmir?

Frankly, if this is indeed a "new world order," rather than a fig leaf for "Rambo" diplomacy, then it looks much like a new tool for enforcing "global liberalism." Its newfound commitment to the liberal economic model has led the Soviet bloc to join with the rest of the North. Further, the challenge of Iraq can easily be seen, and is often denounced, in terms of the struggle between global economic liberalism and Third World empowerment.

One can foresee little for this "new order" other than the continued enforcement of liberalism against the inevitable challenge of outsiders. This system will certainly be incompatible with the interests of much of a no-longer passive Third World.

If it exists at all outside the wet dreams of Washington, then the role of the "new world order" seems to be the enforcement of the doomed cause of global liberalism.

Finally, to those who focus on the real or imagined benefits to international law in the "new order," a question: By staunchly defending the sovereign equality of such anachronistic and untenable entities as Kuwait, are you strengthening or weakening the "sacred principle" of sovereign equality?

Will we all be defending to the death the sovereign equality and integrity of Bahrain, Djibouti or other such states, created at the stroke of a pen by colonial powers for their own convenience, that reflect no cultural, economic or political reality? Is this our idea of the path to justice and stability?

The prospects for a system based on defending the indefensible fail to impress me.

Champagne wishes and caviar dreams, America.

My Macintosh is more important to me than my car. I lent my car to my sister. But nobody's taking my Macintosh.

"I don't know how anybody gets through college today without a Macintosh. Sometimes I have so many assignments that I barely have time for sleep. Yet my Macintosh allows me to get my work done on time—without making sacrifices.
"Working on my dissertation and field studies means collecting an incredible amount of information. So jumping from one program to another with ease is imperative, as is quickly making charts and graphs. By enabling me to do these things, Macintosh probably saves me an hour and a half each day.
"Another great thing about the Macintosh is that it makes you feel technically confident. Remember putting toys together when you were a kid? Who reads the directions? Nobody. You look at the picture of the bike and you know exactly what to do. The Macintosh operates the same way. I actually taught a friend to use one in two minutes.
"What would my life be like without a Macintosh? Scary."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Keep your reactions to yourself until decision time is near. Good luck comes to those who remain true to their ideals. Ask important questions. Others will be happy to share information.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) The old-fashioned way is always best for you. Follow your instincts. Seek a creative solution to a recurring financial problem. Travel plans add to the excitement of a romance.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Your business associates are more receptive to your suggestions now. Timing is everything. Take care of your financial obligations. Look up acquaintances who can play a major role in your career.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) Making an emotional plea will not work as well as laying all your cards on the table. Concentrate on your own goals for a change. New companions lift you out of a rut.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) That tired feeling vanishes when you receive good news about a business deal. Accept an apology and get on with your life. Children cannot mature without a chance to handle responsibility.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) A young couple hears an important decision. Be decisive and a leadership role will be yours. A good day to sign contracts. A romantic partnership becomes more meaningful. Some set the date.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) The spoken or written word seems to favor your plans and speed their completion. Get together with a good friend whose intellect you respect. Use your authority judiciously to avoid legal complications.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) The people who enter your business life are now excellent influences. Their original exciting ideas will inspire you. A mini-vacation will help you recharge your batteries.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Be open to seemingly offbeat suggestions. A romantic or financial situation is still highly unpredictable. A head-turning encounter may be in store for you this evening.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Streamline work procedures while refining your methods. Fresh insights speed things along. It is better to stay home and entertain tonight than to trek off to a party.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) You do your best work alone away from the main action. A close associate may act theatrically. You find a glamorous newcomer very appealing. Remember your prior commitments.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Kind words could calm a troubled psyche. Be lavish in your praise and encouragement. A recent good deed will be royally rewarded. Give credit where it is due.

Eclectic jazz programming around your radio dial

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Radio stations receivable in the Valley offer a surprisingly wide variety of jazz. Despite the fact that this isn't a major metropolitan area, it is possible to listen to jazz during most parts of the day — with one notable exception of afternoons.

As you might expect, stations that offer jazz programming are mostly "left-of-the-dial" college and public radio stations. Those that can be picked up on moderate-quality radios are:

WFCR, 88.5 FM, Amherst (public radio)
WAMH, 89.3 FM, Amherst (Amherst College)
WGBH, 89.7 FM, Boston (public radio)
WAMC, 90.3 FM, Albany, NY (public radio)
WTCC, 90.7 FM, Springfield (STCC)
WMUA, 91.1 FM, Amherst (UMass)
WRSI, 95.3 FM, Greenfield (commercial)

Valley Jazz

Mornings: WMUA features an eclectic mix of jazz weekday mornings from 9 a.m. to noon, while WTCC's Mid-Morning Jazz, focusing on contemporary jazz, airs weekdays from 10 a.m. to noon; the show is extended to 2 p.m. on Tuesdays.

Evenings: WFCR's popular Jazz a la Mode is allotted a scanty one-and-a-half hours a day, airing weekdays from 6:30 to 8 p.m. On Mondays, listeners have more of a choice: WAMH's Night Train runs all the way from 4 p.m. to 2 a.m., while WMUA's All That Jazz (a production of the Black Mass Communications Project) features contemporary jazz from 9:30 p.m. to midnight. If you have a really good stereo, you may be able to pick up Eric in the Evening on WGBH — his anything-goes mix is well worth the effort.

Late nights: WAMC runs various nationally syndicated programs from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m. on weeknights. These shows range from the traditionally-minded Four Queens Jazz Night from Las Vegas and Le Jazz Club from Paris to more eclectic shows such as Afro-Pop Worldwide, The Brazilian Hour and Blues Stage. On WTCC, you can hear Great Black Music (traditional jazz) on Wednesdays 10 p.m. to midnight, Thursdays 10 p.m. to 3 a.m., and Fridays midnight to 3 a.m. WAMC also features Jazz After Hours from midnight to 5 a.m. on Friday nights.

Weekends: WTCC plays more Great Black Music on Saturday and Sundays nights from midnight to 3 a.m. WFCR takes a Safari into jazz and many other musics of Africa and the Pan-African Diaspora on Saturday nights from 8 p.m. until 2 a.m.

WAMC also airs Jazz After Hours on Saturday nights from midnight to 5 a.m.

WAMC reprises several of the syndicated programs it airs during the week on Sunday evenings: Marian McPartland's Piano Jazz at 7 p.m., The American Jazz Radio Festival at 8 p.m., and Le Jazz Club from Paris at 10 p.m. Also on Sunday, you can take a Jazz Cruise on WRSI.

UPC announces first two fall shows

The Union Program Council has announced their first two shows of the fall semester. When and where tickets will go on sale will be announced in the next few weeks.

Boston bands O Positive and Tribe will be appearing on Saturday, Oct. 20 at the Bluewall. Tickets will be $5 for UMass students and $7 for the general public.

New York-based 10,000 Maniacs will be performing at the Fine Arts Center on Saturday, Nov. 17. Tickets will be $14 for UMass students and $17 for the general public.

UMass field hockey coach Pam Hixon had no doubts about tromping Yale, now she and the team eagerly await the game against Old Dominion to be played at Northeastern on Saturday.

Field hockey voids Yale, UDU next

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

As Dick Vitale would say this was a classic M-&-M-er, (mismatch for all you non Vitale fans).

The Universtiy of Massachusetts field hockey team blasted Yale University yesterday 4-0 at Totman Field.

UMass looked sharp, scoring three first half goals. Just over five minutes into the game, Susan Bernegger slipped one past Yale goalie Jen Groeber. The goal was Bernegger's first of the season and it turned out to be the game winner. Bernegger played a solid game, and just missed netting her second goal of the game on two separate occasions.

"We scored early, and we scored often," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "We knew that we would do well against Yale."

One minute later, Beth Thornton scored to up the lead to 2-0. Thornton's shot off of a penalty corner found the left corner of the goal. It was a blast that Groeber had no chance to save.

Thornton's goal took the life right out of the Bulldogs. From then on, the Yale bench which started the game loud and enthusiastic was quiet for the remainder of the game.

"It's difficult to get in sync against a team like Yale, when you're trying to do some things for a different level of play," Hixon said. "We're starting to get in tune for what our game plan will be against Old Dominion."

With 10 minutes left in the half, Thornton pushed the dagger straight through the heart of Yale, when she scored her second goal of the game and fourth of the year.

The second half was only more domination by UMass. Kerri Fagan scored the fourth UMass goal off of a penalty corner, which deflected high in the air off of a Yale player and into the upper corner of the cage.

More important than the outcome of the game (which was never in doubt) was the fact that Hixon was able to play a lot of her players who have not seen much playing time thus far. Tina Rusiecki replaced Philippa Scott in goal, and made some impressive saves.

"We saw a lot of positive things from our kids," said Yale coach Carla Hesler. "I wasn't impressed with UMass' second effort on the ball, I think that's something that they're gonna have to do better against a better team. And I know that they will do that better against a team like Old Dominion."

UMass never let up in the game. In the second half, their passing game was crisp, and there were some strong individual efforts from Holly Hockenbrock, Elise McDevitt and Jessica Gould.

"Their passing game was really nice," Hesler said. "When they play a team like us, they know they don't have to play as hard as they would against an Old Dominion."

This is a game that UMass should win, must win and did win. It's a game that's only going to make Yale a better team according to Hesler.

"We want to play the big guns. If you play everybody who's a mediocre team like yourself, then you don't get better," Hesler said. "We learn a lot from playing these types of teams."

UMass improves their record to 6-1 while the Bulldogs drop to 1-4. The tough part of the schedule is coming up for UMass, the next few weeks will be telling ones.

Men's tennis falls short

Central Conn tarnishes record in 6-3 loss

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team traveled to Central Connecticut State University on Tuesday bringing with them an impressive record of three wins, no losses and a great deal of confidence.

They returned wishing they had stayed home.

Going into the match, UMass coach Manny Roberts knew his team had to win "at least three of the singles matches to have a good shot."

However, the Minutemen were able to squeeze out only two wins in singles competition.

UMass' Barry Wadsworth (4-0) remained undefeated at the number one singles spot as he trounced Central's Chris Gaudreau 6-2, 6-0. In addition, sensational freshman Tim Lipsky (3-0) also kept his record unblemished as he bettered Central's Steve Truethan 6-4, 6-4.

"Tim has been playing really well. There's a good possibility he'll be moving up (from number four singles)," said Roberts.

Unsurprisingly, the only victorious doubles team was Wadsworth and Lipsky. Their contest against Central's Jeff Russell and Jerry Albriks was reduced to an eight game 'pro-set' (first team to win eight games) in which the Minutemen were victorious 8-3.

"They just played a little bit better than us at numbers five and six (singles) and that was the difference in the match,' said Roberts."

Asked if the loss diminished the spirits of his young team, Roberts simply responded, "We always want to win."

The Minutemen will try and bounce back from their first loss as they face rivals Boston University today at 3 p.m. on the Upper Boyden Courts.

"It's definitely a blood match between us and BU," said Roberts.

Sports Notice

JV Lacrosse: The UMass Lacrosse Club will meet at 6:30 p.m., Thurs. Sept. 27 in Boyden room 253 to discuss the fall and spring seasons. For more information, please call J. Dietel at 545-6353 after 7 p.m.

Team set to bulldoze BU

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Every year, in the two weeks between the end of the NFL playoffs and the Super Bowl, we hear seven million reports about how the coaches worry their teams will come out stale after the delay.

With no game scheduled for last weekend, University of Massachusetts coach Jim Reid had his team on the practice field 8 a.m. Saturday. The extra practice time has given the Minutemen a chance to get healthy, and work out the few kinks that showed up in UMass' first two games of the year.

When the Minutemen (1-0-1) take the field against BU on Saturday (1:30 p.m. at McGuirk), they will be rested, not rusty, Reid said.

"We conditioned like a son of a gun, and we cleaned up some things we had to clean up," said Reid of last week's practice. "We didn't start with BU until Saturday."

Tailback John Johnson, who was stripped one time and fumbled another in UMass' 21-10 win over Maine, took some extra pitches. The receivers got in some passing work. The team did a lot of situps.

"It's just so unusual to have a week off, that you really don't know how to handle it" said Reid.

Around the Yankee Conference: New Hampshire's 28-20 comeback win against Maine in Orono put the Wildcats on top of the league standings with a 3-0 record. Rhode Island, Villanova and UMass are tied for second at 1-0.

UNH was piloted by sophomore running back Barry Bourassa, who scored two touchdowns. Bourassa leads the league with a 5.5 yards-per-carry average. Maine dropped to 0-3.

URI raised it's record to 3-0 overall with a 23-3 win over Brown. Back John Newson rushed for 162 yards on 35 tries; Newson leads the Conference with 411 total yards.

Connecticut's free-fall continued with a 24-7 loss to William and Mary, which dropped the Huskies to 0-3 overall (0-1 in the Conference). Quarterback Matt DeGennaro missed the game with bruised ribs, and is doubtful for this weekend as well.

Delaware, 1-1 in the Conference and 2-1 overall, beat West Chester 13-12.

UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos is averaging 87.5 yards-per-game rushing, third-best in the league . . . The Minutemen are second in the Conference in team rushing with a 263-yard average. URI is first with 268.3.

Crews take on Textile Rv. Regatta this weekend

By DAVE GORVINE
Collegian Correspondent

As the men's crew team opens their new season at the Head of the Textile River Regatta this Sunday, the key word will be experience. That is what they hope to gain from the four regattas which make up the fall season, in preparation for the main season next spring.

Coach Dave Trond, now beginning his fifth season with the team, is impressed with his present crop of talent and feels that they will be much faster when the sophomores and seniors have more experience rowing together.

Several top rowers graduated from last year's team but Trond believes that the second-year rowers replacing them, who last season were among the top teams in the junior-varsity Nationals, will be more than adequate for the task at the next level of competition. "They're one of the strongest groups I've had," said Trond. "They're just pretty raw right now."

This Sunday's regatta will be run on the Merrimack River in Lowell. The men's team includes two crews: a heavyweight, led by seniors Dave Ring, Dave Schor and Jeff Bohr and a lightweight, led by Rich Scannell, Chris Marino and Mark Haley.

The field will be made up of around a dozen crews, including Lowell, Tufts, Brown and Boston University among others. Coach Trond expects the toughest competition to come from the Riverside Boat Club (a Boston-based crew) in the lightweight class, and the Coast Guard Academy in both classes.

The women's crew team, coached by Deborah Fine, will also be competing at Lowell, where they are the defending champions.

They also graduated some top rowers from last season's team but are confident that their strong group of sophomores will keep the crew very competitiive. Led by veterans Jen Blum and Rachel White, the women's crew will try to repeat last fall's success against the challenges of opponents who include MIT, Wesleyan and Boston University.

1990 Goodwill Mission brings Chinese tradition to the Fine Arts Center at UMass

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

The 1990 Chinese Youth Goodwill Mission returns to the University of Massachusetts tonight, entertaining through cultural dances, games, songs and exchanges of friendship.

This group of students from Taipei, Republic of China, formed in 1974 and hails from various colleges and universities in Taiwan. This particular group in Amherst is one of a group of three Goodwill missions traveling internationally at this moment. One has been sent to each of the East and West coasts of the United States and the third to the Middle East and Africa.

This is the third visit to UMass by these students and Borliang Chen, president of the Chinese Student Club said, "The group won't visit the same place very often. I think they agreed to return because they were so popular last time."

Chen said they were invited last year and will conclude travel at the end of November. "Since the culture [in China] is a combination of Western and Chinese culture and tradition, it will be presented so people can appreciate the uniqueness of each."

Hsiao-Ching Cheng, of the Chinese Student Club, said the students will present "Pi-Ser Chuan." It is a legend of a snake who becomes a woman and finds, one rainy day, that she is without an umbrella, and asks a man if she can borrow his. Eventually, they fall in love. However, there is a priest in the town who knows what the woman really is, and doesn't want the two together.

Folk sports will also be presented. Chen said a pastime that young people in China have enjoyed is something similar to hacky sack but uses the feathers of birds instead.

Some costume styles and dances will date to the Tang Dynasty (618 to 907). Depictions of spring on the islands and tea-leaf picking will display some Chinese lifestyles.

There will be expressions of modern dance as well by these talented students. All performers must have some experience dancing and must speak English in order to become a part of the troupe, Chen said. He reports that many individuals are interested in performing with this group but a select few remain.

Fine Arts Center, UMass 8 p.m. Tonight. Tickets are only $3 for students and $5 for the general public. A reception in the FAC will follow the performance, allowing the audience to talk with the students.

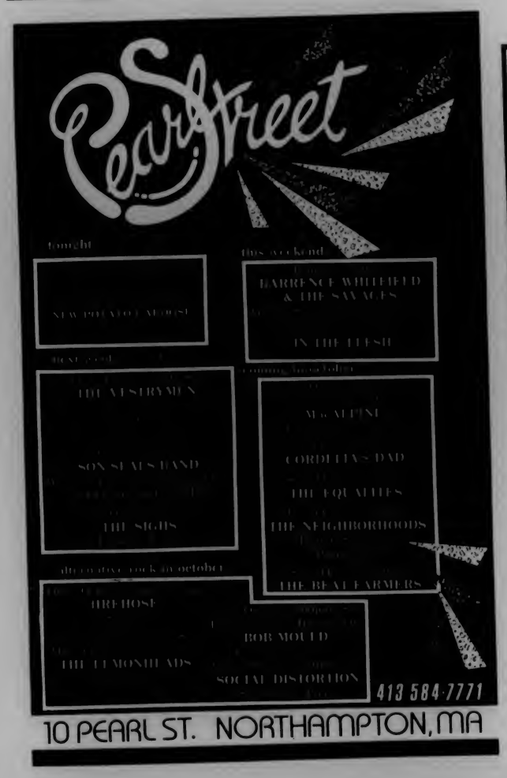
Wrecking Crew/Eye for an Eye/Bloodbath will wreak havoc upon Katina's in Hadley.



Successful opera comes to FAC

The University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center opens its 1990-91 season Saturday night, with Ken Ludwig's Tony Award-winning comedy, Lend Me a Tenor.

Starring actors Barry Nelson and Ron Holgate, Lend Me a Tenor is a brilliant satirical farce, complete with mistaken identities, misunderstandings, secret connivings and romantic mishaps.

Set in a lavish hotel suite, the story revolves around a glittering opera gala production placed in jeopardy when a famous tenor is unable to perform.

The action takes place in Ohio in 1934, when an international opera star, Il Stupendo, comes to Cleveland for his American debut in the Cleveland Opera's production of Verdi's Otello.

A series of hilarious situations arise when the star becomes indisposed an hour before the curtain is due to go up.

Lend Me a Tenor began its career in London, was nominated for an Olivier Award and has been performed in nine languages throughout Europe.

As Broadway's longest running comedy, Lend Me a Tenor was nominated for seven Tony Awards, four Drama Desk Awards and three Outer Critics' Circle Awards.

Lend Me a Tenor will be playing at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall for two nights, Saturday, Sept. 29 and Sunday, Sept. 30. Curtain time is 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office for $30, $28 and $26. Five College student tickets are half-price.

Academic decreases outlined

Faculty Senate approves program reductions

By JULIA SERERINSKY
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate voted yesterday to accept the administration's proposal to reduce and possibly eliminate unspecified departments and academic programs in the wake of another round of budget cuts at the University of Massachusetts.

President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey outlined measures recommended by the administration after another $5.9 million were cut from the UMass-Amherst budget on Tuesday.

The measures include an increase of student fees for the spring semester, a substantial administrative and modest across-the-board cuts, and the reductions of academic programs to be named later in the year.

Duffey said that the possibility of a student fee increase "was not a first choice" and if the increase is levied, the administration will attempt to raise the financial aid fund.

Duffey said the amount of the increase has not been estimated as of yet.

Provost Richard O'Brien said the option for fee increase is "painful, unpleasant, and negative."

In reference to the selective reduction and possible elimination of departments and academic programs, O'Brien said that it would be inevitable that they be affected after the three rounds of budget cuts incurred in the last three months.

"The academic programs [comprise] 75 percent of the budget," O'Brien said. "Obviously something has to be done on this end, and that is to reduce the programs selectively."

According to a report from Duffey and O'Brien, which was issued earlier in the week, the administration will announce, by October 11, which departments are targeted for reductions.

The basis for reduction, as set by the Reallocation Committee, includes scholarly excellence as well as the number of undergraduates being taught.

Under the reduction program, faculty would be reduced by 10 percent within the next three years, according to the report.

The report also stated that the administration intends to respect the principle of tenure system. If program termination option will be implemented, the tenured faculty will be reassigned to other departments or responsibilities.

Duffey said yesterday that if the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition passes in November, it will "devastate" people who have contracts with the state.

The petition, if adopted, would reduce the UMass budget by another $25 million, comprising a 40 percent reduction for the 1990-1991 fiscal year.

"We are unfortunate to have to acknowledge how profound the economic situation is," Duffey said referring to the latest round of budget cuts by the Massachusetts Legislature.

A $310 million cut from the state budget was announced on Tuesday. The cut was implemented in order to prevent further devaluation of state bonds.

"It must be acknowledged that we are in a deep recession," Duffey said. "We face at best a perhaps 18-month period before we see the economy restored."

Sutton possibly involved in fight before accident

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Amherst police are investigating the possibility that former University of Massachusetts basketball star Lorenzo Sutton was involved in an altercation just before being struck by a car last Sunday morning, according to a police spokesperson.

Sutton remained in critical condition yesterday at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield as a result of head injuries he sustained in the accident.

Police said the woman who drove the car which struck Sutton was Jean Kokoszka, 21, a junior at UMass who lives at Mill Valley Estates. She was cited later Sunday

Bush explores using national oil stockpile

By RITA BEAMISH
The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — President Bush is warning US and world oil markets that if "intensive and unwarranted speculation" does not end, he may expand the first-time use of the national petroleum stockpile to control escalating prices.

The president announced Wednesday he will sell 5 million barrels from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

"I'm prepared to take additional steps, if necessary, to ensure that America stays strong right here at home," Bush told a political fund-raising audience in Rosemont, Ill., on Wednesday night.

Fall cuts severely damage UMass

University administrators still struggle against state

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The month of September is coming to a close, but the legacy of this month's budget cuts will keep the University in a state of fiscal chaos for years to come.

This month, the University has lost approximately $10.1 million in state-allocated funds. These cuts come after a July 7 cut of $5.9 million. The administration cannot keep up with the hard-hitting cuts by the Statehouse. They may be subsequently forced to reduce or terminate ten or more departments or programs, combining fee increases with faculty layoffs.

News Analysis

University administrators have thus far juggled the budget, reducing costs in relatively hidden areas to avoid laying off professors. However, the latest cut has ended all such efforts as the Executive Office of Finance and Administration shut down the University's computer accounts and extracted approximately $5.3 million to salvage the state's bonded deficit.

Our pleas to the state are falling on deaf ears. Gov. Dukakis has abandoned public higher education despite his claims of caring about the futures of Massachusetts college students. Only a few out of 200 legislators who compose the House Ways and Means Committee, which makes crucial decisions regarding the budget, advocated this year for public higher education funding.

Massachusetts' severe economic recession is just beginning to effect public higher education. That the cuts will continue for at least two more years is a conservative state house estimate. The November election will also greatly effect our funding if the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition, ballot question number three, passes. This petition will cut 38 percent more in state higher education subsidies.

Through the primary results this month, the voting public, angry and frustrated, elected two gubernatorial candidates who will not sympathize with public higher education. Many voters disregard state colleges and universities as yet another overextended state expense. Other voters see state subsidies to higher education as supporting ungrateful, whining students who organize solely for their own political purposes. Even though polling results have shown public support for education, this support has not been translated into budget allocations. The voting public has not realized that 70 percent of public higher education graduates join the Massachusetts workforce.

The public higher education system is going to face major restructuring this year to consolidate programs and

"Macintosh practically eliminates the need to keep manuals next to my computer, because—regardless of which program I'm using—I can open, close, save, and print files in exactly the same way. And you can't say that about any other computer.

"Today lots of other computers are attempting to look and work like a Macintosh, but it's just not possible. They're too fundamentally different to begin with. This may sound a little strange, but comparing a Macintosh to other computers is like comparing apples to oranges. You can squash the orange into shape and paint it to look like an apple, but underneath the makeup, it's still an orange.

"It's funny—I work at the Vanderbilt computer store and I've seen lots of people switch from other computers to Macintosh, but I've never seen anybody with a Macintosh switch to another computer."

Expert panel discusses aspects of eating disorders

By LINDSAY HOADLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 10 percent of students at the University of Massachusetts are affected by eating disorders, according to a expert panel from a rehabilitation clinic in Brattleboro, Vermont.

A panel from the Brattleboro Retreat discussed the causes and effects of anorexia nervosa, bulimia and compulsive eating to a standing room only audience in the Campus Center Wednesday.

"It's easy to kid yourself into thinking that everyone is on a diet and that everyone wants to be thin," said Gayle Lilly, a registered nurse and the director of education at the retreat.

"An eating disorder is one way people avoid feeling. The reason we are here is because it has the potential of killing."

"We find that five to ten years of having a life that revolves around food results in a very isolated person," said Lilly. "When food becomes a person's habituated learning style, they cheat themselves out of coping with things in a healthy way."

Janice Wall, a nutritionist, said societal views on dieting, and misinformation about nutrition can contribute to an eating disorder.

"The very concept of going 'on' a diet implies we'll be able to go 'off' of it," she said.

The way thinness and food are portrayed in advertising sends contradictory messages to the audience. Advertising idealizes thin women while using food as an alternative to dealing with actual problems at hand, she said.

Wall used an advertisement which featured the image of a woman offering her family a cake captioned with "If you frost a cake, you can win a heart" as an example.

Sandy Campbell, a psychologist, said the way women define themselves often is determined by their weight.

"The media message is very strong and it's everywhere," she said. "It doesn't cause eating disorders but it is certainly a factor."

Campbell discussed how to go about dealing with a friend or a loved one with an eating disorder. She advised to not get involved with the language of food or of weight and appearance, since the food is hiding what the real problem may be for a person with an eating disorder.

"Try to get in touch with what's underneath the food, to what the person is feeling," she said.

The panel urged any audience members to help themselves or anyone they may know suffering from an eating disorder, stressing that help is available. For more information on campus programs, call 549-2671 (ext. 181).

Brenner calls for activity within Socialist Party

By PETER HERING
Collegian Correspondent

What some Socialists are referring to as the beginning of a "virulent new epoch," has the human race facing the age-old problems of hunger, poverty, racism and war.

In a dialogue on the future of Socialism, Robert Brenner, editor of Against the Current and member of Solidarity, stated now is the time for the Socialist Party to act.

"What is to be done after a period of such inactivity?" asked Brenner, referring to the 80s. "The division between the rich and the poor is expanding, the national debt is growing, and people's wages are comparatively lower than in the 70s."

Brenner believes the US needs revived mass activity, as was present in the 1930s and 60s.

His proposal of a Socialist-planned economy would enable people to better control their work environment and their own lives.

Brenner said it was not surprising to see Socialism fail in Eastern Europe. However, he views events of the past year as encouraging in changing how the world thinks about Socialism.

"Unfortunately, the idea of Socialism has never caught on in this country," said Brenner.

"Capitalism hasn't solved anybody's problems, and with the fiscal situation we face in this country, it can only get worse," he added.

Tom Gallagher, chairman of the Boston chapter of Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), believes Socialism has been dragged down unfairly in this country.

"Although Socialism is dead in this country, it's has been rated very positively in the European countries," he said. "Even in Canada, the movement is gaining momentum."

Both Brenner and Gallagher see Capitalism as a failing system. They believe Capitalism is in a state of constant turmoil, and by engaging in a Socialistic economy, many of the current problems would be eliminated.

"We're trying to provide the people with an alternative way of looking at the economy, the environment, racism, and poverty," said Gallagher. "Capitalism is a system in a constant crisis, and it will not provide a solution to the world-wide problems of poverty and war."

"The Democratic planned economy is ill-fated," said Brenner. "It is a situation where the bureaucracy is in control and the people become alienated. We want to change that."

GLB Speakers Bureau seeks new members

By ALI WOOLWICH
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Speakers' Bureau is seeking members for the fall 1990 semester.

The Speaker's Bureau is a group of gay, lesbian and bisexual men and women who work to educate the campus community about gay, lesbian and bisexual reality, homophobia and heterosexism.

Speakers' Bureau members speak openly about their experiences to people in classes, residence halls and student groups.

The program, which serves the Five College and local Pioneer Valley community, is run by the UMass Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns (PGLBC).

The Speakers' Bureau's purpose is this:

- to educate, using factual information and personal experiences about gay, lesbian and bisexual people.
- to contradict myths and stereotypes about gay, lesbian and bisexual people.
- to answer questions people have concerning gay, lesbian and bisexual people.
- to be openly gay, lesbian or bisexual and thus serve as positive role models for others who may be questioning their sexuality or are in the process of coming out as gay, lesbian or bisexual.

A recent addition to the program has been the inclusion of heterosexual allies as speakers. The addition of allies' perspectives are seen as yet another way of bridging the gap of understanding.

Applications to join the Speakers' Bureau are available at the PGLBC office located in the lobby of John Adams Tower, Southwest.

The next training session on Wednesday, October 3, from 7 to 10 p.m. in Campus Center room 805-809.

New trainees who have yet to observe a speaking engagement can attend the program scheduled for Monday, October 1, at 8 p.m. in Brett second floor lounge.

More information about the Speakers' Bureau or panel requests for dorms, groups or classes is availible by phoning the PGLBC at 545-4824.

Ten tires reported missing

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Police have received three complaints of tire theft since Tuesday in various parking lots around campus.

A public safety officer on patrol in Lot 44 found a Ford Tempo missing two tires. The owner was unaware that the tires were missing. The estimated value was $200.

Later that day, a student reported to police that all four tires had been stolen off his 1986 Ford Escort. The estimated value was $800.

Police discovered on Wednesday a second vehicle missing all four wheels. The owner of the car reported additional damage to the undercarriage. The estimated damage was $1200.

ARREST

- Mark S. Richardson, 20, of Holyoke, was arrested Tuesday on Kennedy Drive for trespassing and alcohol violations.

LARCENY

- An industrial motor, valued at $2800, was stolen from a mechanical room in the Campus Center. Police said the motor was apparently taken by cutting wires attached to the machine.

reduce expenditures. Students' input on the clarified goals of public higher education, will be a part of a proposed regional system, which will be made public. Schools without clarified program goals could be closed due to funding problems. UMass needs to temporarily divorce itself from the budget cycle and decide where it wants to fit in to the regional system, if at all.

However, the rift between the student body and the administration grows with each campus cut. Programs and departments such as the Everywomen's Center, which has lost more than half of its staff already this year. The internal divisions will increase as administrators make more cuts.

The student opposition to the CLT petition has been strong and vocal in encouraging the student body to register to vote. But who is going to reach the voters statewide to turn public opinion back in favor of public higher education? The University has not benefited by this economic turmoil and reacting negatively to the government in the same manner as the angry voters. The public confidence in state higher education must be restored before the funding will.

Preventing the passage of ballot question three is crucial to keep UMass the flagship university of the state. Voter opinion is equally important because it could help students build a constituency for public higher education. With a constituency, funding for state colleges and universities will become a priority, not an afterthought. For now, the next two years will be a rough financial ride for public higher education.

She later called police and admitted her involvement in the incident. She will be arraigned in Northampton District Court.

A police spokesperson said yesterday a man who was with Sutton at the time of the altercation will be brought in for questioning on the incident.

The spokesperson said police are investigating the theory that Sutton was being chased at the time he was struck in the traveler's lane of North Pleasant Street shortly after 2:15 a.m. Sunday.

The petroleum reserve, now containing 590 million barrels, was established in 1975 to ward against potential future oil shortages.

The president said he wanted to test the process of drawing down the reserve. He said the country has "sufficient oil to meet current needs," and added that "there is no justification for the intensive and unwarranted speculation in oil futures."

Oil prices have skyrocketed to nearly $40 a barrel since Iraq invaded Kuwait on Aug. 2 and the United Nations imposed a trade embargo against Baghdad.

Bush's decision marks the first time the government has tapped into the reserve. It comes at a time when the administration says there is not an oil shortage, but as officials also are warning the Middle East crisis could result in tight supplies by the end of the year.

"We've been suggesting this to him," said Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., chairman of the House energy and Commerce Committee. But he said the administration needs to call on West Germany and Japan to also tap their stockpiles.

Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas, who more than a month ago called on Bush to tap the reserve, also welcomed the president's decision.

Food Science major — the University's best-kept secret

It's not fair.

It's not fair that so few people are privy to the best kept secret on campus. For two years, I have been a student in one of the smallest and least understood majors at the University of Massachusetts. I am a Food Science major.

Being a Food Science major militates a constant need to dispel myths and misconceptions that people have about the field. Quite frankly, food science is the backbone of the entire food industry and the research base for foods of the future.

Food science is responsible for our abundant food supply as we know it today. Walk into any supermarket and you will see the tangible definition of food science: Shelves and shelves of frozen, canned, dried and packaged foods available at nominal prices. Because of these preservation methods, we have a large variety of safe foods year round, and this in turn results in Americans spending a lower percentage of their disposable incomes on food than any other nation in the world.

Food science, as a major, is even more exciting. The Department at the University is the oldest in the country. It is recognized as one of the premier food science departments in the country because the faculty members are among the leading authorities in their areas of specialization. This combination carries clout for the student, when he or she pursues a career in the food industry or goes on to graduate school.

The small size of the department is another appealing aspect of food science. All of the professors, including the department head, know all of the students individually. This makes for a much more personalized learning experience. I feel like I am having my cake and eating it too because I get the benefits of a small private school at a huge university.

Edward Schiffman

Food science classes for majors are always small. More than 10 people is considered a large class. Food science majors never have to worry about getting their classes — an issue that has become more of a concern with the continued budget cuts.

The small classes also promote a sense of comradeship. Food science students become a tight-knit group because they do a lot of activities together. Some of my best friends are people I've met in food science.

The courses are very interesting because they deal with everyone's favorite subject: Food! Courses such as food processing, food chemistry and food microbiology comprise the heart of the major. These courses, in conjunction with prerequisites of chemistry, physics, microbiology, biochemistry and biology, yield a student with a rich science background.

As long as people eat, food companies will need food scientists. Average salaries for someone with a bachelor's degree start in the high $20,000 range. A master's degree will command $35,000 and higher. Employment opportunities are excellent and exist all over the country and the world.

If you like both food and science, you may be interested in studying food science. Don't despair over the idea of changing your major. Most Food Science majors enter the department this way. It's rare to find a frosh Food Science major because they, like most people, were once unaware of the field and opportunity.

This secret is too good to keep.

Let religion say its piece

These are the days of awe.

Last week I missed two classes to go home for one of the most sanctified days in the Jewish calendar. I had to miss school. Still, most people were very kind to me.

My only professor who cancelled class was Julius Lester, who was going to celebrate the New Year himself. Prof. Drake also made the effort to minimize my absence by just slowing slides and not taking attendance. In my other class, I will have to get the notes from a friend and hope I didn't miss any important tidbits by not sitting in class. This year Yom Kippur is on a weekend. Hurrah.

Mark B. Adler

Every year it's the same. Come December, Christians will kvetch that finals were too close to Christmas. Maybe Spring Break will end on Easter, and they will have to cut short their Easter dinner to drive back to school. I still don't envy them the convenience of living in a Christian nation with Blue Laws.

Religion is supposed to be an inconvenience.

Next to the American doctrine "separation of church and state" is an attempt by UMass to allow celebration of religions.

We have student clubs representing a veritable plethora of religions including, but not limited to: Pagan Students Organization, B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation, Muslim Students Assoc., Baha'i Club, United Christian Foundation, Campus Crusade for Christ, Newman Students Assoc, and many others.

Other religions include Hinduism, Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism, Shintoism and Shamanism, and these groups have members at UMass.

But there goes the neighborhood. The Boston Church of Christ is coming to town. Oh, my God, a CULT! Eeek!

In my RA staff meeting I was told to post information on how just to say no to this and other "cults." I was amazed. It seems that UMass is unwilling to peremit these Christians from proselytizing on our otherwise enlightened campus. Golly.

"Why not? What's wrong with these dudes?" I hear you cry. The answer: They take advantage of you when you are having problems and they take your money." Oooooh.

When I have a problem, I like to talk to my Rabbi and often she is helpful to me in my times of distress. Rev. Hargis of the UCF and Father Quigley, of Newman fame, are excellent resources for Christians and non-Christians alike. But this "cult" makes you join when you have little resistance and then it doesn't permit you personal freedom (so I've been officially told in University pamphlets). Gee.

But that's the point of religions. When a freethinking person chooses to adhere to certain religious tenets, they must give up some freedom. They (you and me) are joining a group and some of our groups say "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not."

People speaking against this "cult" refuse contraceptives, immunizations or transplants, or avoid pork and shellfish or meat on Fridays. This is not freedom, but we choose such restrictions, they make us a holy people. If converts to the Church of Christ are told what to do, that's their choice.

I've enjoyed visiting Christian services. At the end of some, basket is passed around the pews and people are expected (and peer pressured) to put money in it. Wow. For my Rosh Hashanah services last week, I had to show an entry ticket (costing big bucks).

Every group (religious or not) needs funding from its members for support. If the Church of Christ asks too much of its believers, then that's their choice.

Do I agree with this group? Sure. I object to all non-Jewish faiths. I only accept Reform Judaism as my religion. We are the chosen people. No doubt. Do I object to the proselytizing on campus of the Church of Christ (a.k.a. The Cult)? Of course not!

They, like every religious (or non-religious) group, should be given the opportunity to make themselves known. If students want to join them, it's their free choice. (If they are being harassed, then it's illegal and the police should be called in.)

While we don't have to accept or agree to alternate religions, it's about time to let them say their piece. Shalom.

Soviet reforms drastic

This Monday a large majority voted for a resolution in the Supreme Soviet that will give President Gorbachev new powers to enforce reforms unilaterally. This does not come as a great surprise to many since the recent years have revealed a turmoil in the Soviet economy and a competent leader who seems ready to do something about it.

Whether Gorbachev will be able to transform centralized socialism into a market economy in 500 days is somewhat doubtful.

Lars Kroijer

With supply shortages of everything from housing to bread and a very intolerant public opinion, Gorbachev will have to make drastic changes in order to fulfill expectations.

And drastic changes are exactly what Gorbachev intends to make.

How will all this affect our lives and why should we care? Do we not have problems enough with our own economy to go and help our former enemy to build a market economy that could eventually compete with us?

First of all, I do not believe that the government should help financially.

They have other things to spend their money on.

What most westerners just five years ago thought of as a major threat to global security is now planning to turn 80 percent of their economy into private hands. One has to be impressed.

If the plan succeeds, it is most likely that major American companies will have a large amount of production and investment in the Soviet Union. It is possible simply because a 100 percent ownership of Soviet companies is allowed by foreign investors.

The Soviet Union (being the largest nation in the world) opens an enormous market for anyone who believes in Gorbachev's reforms.

Imagine a world where the two strongest military powers stand together in the defense of democracy and are able to keep dictators like Saddam Hussein from getting too much influence on the world order.

Think of what the Bush administration could save on military expenditures if we were allies, and not enemies, with the Soviet Union.

These expenditures are indirectly paid though taxes and lower expenditures would, if not lower taxes, lead to an improved economy.

The people against the reforms in the Soviet Union should think again.

A man who struggles for an open and free economy should not be allowed to fail. He should receive the support required for success.

The success of Gorbachev would lead to a new power balance that all Americans should support — an overwhelming strength of democratic states against a small group of totalitarian states with little or no influence on the world order.

ARTS & LIVING

At the SU: Revel...Reveal...Revelation...Return

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Revel...Reveal...Revelation...Return is the group exhibition currently being shown in the Student Union Art Gallery. It is an eclectic exhibition with paintings by Paul Eagan, ceramic vessels by potter Scott Supranor, collaborative tile wall pieces by Mimi Strang and Gloria Kosco and a clay installation by Susie Nacco.

The exhibition opened with a reception on Thursday, Sept. 13 and will be open until Oct. 9.

The paintings by Eagan are created with heavy layers of various colors of oil paint on canvas. The surface on some areas of the paintings has been scratched away to reveal different colors beneath. All of his works are done in the same wild, fluorescent color scheme.

"Layer upon layer of color is vital in each painting as it not only creates its own illusion but combined with form and figure, stimulates and promotes further visions and ideas to take place," Eagan explains.

The viewer can also recognize repetition in subject in his paintings. Such as the a circular image that surfaces in his works that is sometimes repeated as a clock.

"The symbols shown in each painting have meaning, not individually but collectively as dictated by surrounding images and impressions generated by color," says Eagan.

Mr Eagan, 28, graduated from Rhode Island School of Design with a BFA in Painting and Sculpture in 1985. He has an extensive resume hich dates back to October 2, 1972 with first place in the Woonsocket Fine Arts Show. A more recent exhibition took place at the Charles Lucien Gallery in New York City (6/6/90-7/1/90). Mr. Eagan currently resides in Greenwich, Connecticuit.

Of the group of his paintings being shown in the Student Union, Mr. Eagan said "Diver" as his favorite.

Because of the drying time necessary for his heavy style of painting, Mr. Eagan works on many paintings at the same time. He is currently working on eighteen canvases.

Susie Nacco, artist of an installation and a large steel clay sculpture, likes a more starting type of art. "(Art) should be a kick in the stomach." Ms. Nacco, 31, is now working towards her MFA at Southern Massachusetts University and has a BFA from Massachusetts College of Art.

Ms. Nacco's clay sculpture installation is of an emaciated human on an altar, caged in phantom-like wires and surrounded by autumn leaves. A tiny clay figure peeps in through the wire on one side. This installation seemed to evoke the strongest reaction from viewers and differs from the colorful, practical pieces of pottery which surround it in the exhibit.

"The narrative of this piece should not be singular but should vary with the individual," Ms. Nacco explains in her statement about the piece. However, she does offer her own interpretation.

"Sometimes, we are confronted with a symbol of all we had wished away. And then, even the most innocent is faced with her pain, remembers her scars and remembers what she did to survive. At a point in time, if only a brief moment, she acknowledges her own inhumanness and what is able to be put away, deep away, with an unyielding strength. Most of us can endure anything, because we are compelled to survive."

She says that she didn't become "a clay-head" until 1985, because she wasn't focused until then.

Other works were submitted by Scott Supranor who has a BFA from SUNY Purchase. He currently resides in Luray, Virginia where he works as a teacher and potter. Mr. Supranor's pots are wheel thrown and intricately glazed with a variety of slip, wax, and scrafito techniques. Afterward, the pots are high fired. Some of his works have images of babies such as "Adam's World" which is colored in beige and shades of green; the figures are outlined in black. Also featured is a bowl set done in turquoise and pinks and designed with a black outline.

Mimi Strang graduated from Rhode Island School of Design in 1985 with a BFA in Ceramics. She is presently a partner with Gloria Kosco in Decoratta Ornamental Terra Cotta in Silverdale, Pennslyvania.

Ms. Kosco received her MFA in Ceramics at RISD in 1985, also. She has participated in many residencies and workshops as well as exhibitions. Her work has also been published in Home Magazine and Ceramics Monthly.

Tile wall hangings were exhibited by both Ms. Kosco and Ms. Strang in addition to an outstanding joint work entitled "Set Pedestal Planter I" of ceramic and masonry.

Very worthy of a visit, Revel . . . Reveal . . . Revelation . . . Return is a thought provoking collection with many very different styles of sculpture.

Dread Zep: Whole Lotta Laughs

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Dread Zeppelin
Pearl Street
Tuesday, Sept. 25

It was a goofy night indeed.

But what could I expect? I was going to see a group that is based on an concept so totally fried that one needs to smoke a joint just understand the whole thing.

I mean they're a reggae band, but they cover Led Zeppelin tunes and mix it up with the best of what one would find at an Elvis show in Vegas style, as their lead singer is an Elvis impersonator. No, it's not a spawn of a bad acid trip, it's Dread Zeppelin.

Their performance Tuesday night for a decent-sized crowd at Pearl Street, was both an aural and visual attack on the funny bone. Their stage presence and antics were as good and as funny as the music they played — and played well.

Lead singer Tortelvis was impeccably dressed in Viva Las Vegas fashion complete with cape, sideburns and leis. He sang and spoke just like you would expect from an Elvis impersonator. Lead guitarist Carl Jah faked Jimmy Pagerisms. And bassist Putmon sported a groovy crash helmet and played his bass with a rubber lobster at one point.

Musically, their set consisted of a Zeppelin revue. They played jamming versions of "The Ocean" and "Immigrant Song." But the funniest moment had to be when they played their rendition of "Heartbreaker," mixing the music of "Heartbreaker" with the words to "Heartbreak Hotel."

At one point, Tortelvis kicked drummer Fresh Cheese off the riser so that he could play a shortened version of "Moby Dick." He wasn't bad for an Elvis impersonator. After his drum antics, he told the audience that he wanted to tell them a story. As he spoke the words to "Heartbreaker," lead guitarist Carl Jah accompanied him with some mellow guitar playing. Of course he bastardized the lyrics, "Well it's been ten years or maybe more since I first set eyes on you . . . some people cry and some people die by the wicked ways of love but I just keep on rolling along with the grace of a whopper from Burger King."

The crowd loved their performance. I even witnessed some stage diving antics. When they finished off their set with "My Way," the crowd stomped and cheered for an encore — a request which was dutifully obliged.

Of course one of the encores was "Stairway to Heaven." When I was young and played my Zeppelin records, while dreaming of being Jimmy Page's love slave, I never imagined that I would one day be hearing a reggae version of "Stairway to Heaven." Yet, on Tuesday night, I did and it was awesome.

Our Apologies: Due to an editing error, the headline on page three of This Weekend was incorrect. Lend Me A Tenor is not an opera — it is a comedy and we apologize to any you who might have been turned away from the idea of seeing this show at the FAC on Saturday or Sunday at 8 p.m. at the cost of $30, $28, or $26 per ticket.

TANGELO PIE
By TIM SNIFFEN

Hi, folks. Now that this Shawmut thing is just about over, I thought it might be nice to just slow down for a day and look at some of the Cartoon Magic we employ, here at Tangelo Pie.
For instance, here is a bag of bona fide, hard-earned money -- money that your own parents may have worked for.
Marcus, on the other hand, is merely holding a bag of CARTOON money. But except for experts, the two are virtually identical!
I repeat, Virtually Identical. In fact, this plays a key part in how I got Marcus out of jail.
-And why there's still a jacuzzi in the closet.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Everyone has momentary doubts about his ability to meet challenges. Hold your head up high! Your progressive ideas are right on target. Good news comes later today.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Phone friends and loved ones who would enjoy hearing your voice. A candid chat will improve a close relationship. Marriage and romance are very much in your thoughts. Let your feelings show.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) The job front contains some good news although not quite as much as you would have liked. Be nice to your clients at work. Nonetheless, things are looking up! Put romance on the back burner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Odd distractions and points of interest mark this work day, requiring a disciplined approach. The social and professional competition may be keen. Romance figures prominently in your personal plans.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Positive, exciting developments are seen where your ambitions or residence is concerned. Take an original approach. You might find that your dreams provide the key to a decision.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) It pays to back up your original ideas with solid, responsible effort. Reassure others who may be doubtful of your intentions or abilities. Group activities could interfere with your private wishes.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Financial and business agreements can be finalized now. Do not underestimate the talents or services offered by others. Your mood tonight is sociable and fun-loving. Get out and mingle.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Your social or business prestige is on the upswing now. You could be asked to head a large-scale project that is right up your alley! Keep a romantic involvement on a high plane.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Stick to your ideals but be flexible on minor issues. Financial gains stem from a new job or the presence of the unexpected. The progressiveness of your ideas can be trusted now.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Avoid teasing someone who can be volatile. Be careful not to sound cold or cruel when outlining the facts as you see them. Take an original approach to a routine work assignment.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Handle work and domestic chores responsibly so you can spend an interesting evening with a close friend. New benefits stem from influential contacts. You and that special someone want to be alone!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Your creativity and charm make this a pleasant day. Discuss a novel self-employment idea, or look for inspiration in books. A sudden shift at the top could affect your standing at work.

Water polo hits Fordham

By JOE DEGLORIA
Collegian Staff

The 7-3 University of Massachusetts water polo team travels to Fordham University in the Bronx this weekend to play Queens, Fordham, and a strong Iona team.

Ninteenth-ranked UMass has already played Queens and Iona and beat them 12-7 and 8-4, respectively. UMass has not faced Fordham this year.

The biggest game of the weekend for UMass is the Iona game Sunday.

"This is a must win game for us, we have to beat them to remain ranked and to assure a bid for post-season play," Yarworth said.

Yarworth considers Iona a big rival and points out that UMass has never beaten them in their home state of New York. Iona's team has had a lot of changes recently with the head coach resigning last week. Iona is also a very young squad; three of its starters are freshmen.

Yarworth said he hopes that these factors will go in UMass's favor.

Leading the UMass team in scoring is senior Jon Miller with 26 goals in nine games. Miller also leads the team with 14 assists. Injured (broken thumb) sophomore Dan Mcosker has contributed 14 goals as well. Junior Alex Yelensky has also helped with 12 scores.

On the defensive side, senior G.T. Ladd has drawn a team high 21 ejections. Each ejection drawn gives the team a prime scoring oppurtunity.

Gary Wilkos scrambled for 146 yards in 19 rushes two weeks ago against Maine. The Minutemen face Boston University this Saturday at 1:30 p.m. at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

BU brings run-and-shoot

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Boston University's run-and-shoot attack and the University of Massachusett's 10-points-a-game defense will butt heads tomorrow at McGuirk Alumni Stadium in Amherst. Kickoff is at 1:30 p.m.

Against Holy Cross on opening day and Maine two weeks ago, the Minutemen (1-0-1) handled teams that have tormented them in the last few years. BU offers the chance for UMass to continue the trend.

In Boston last season, quarterback Stan Greene passed for 299 yards and the Terriers (1-3) rolled to a 41-19 win, a game that "humiliated" UMass, said coach Jim Reid.

In the offseason, Ried adjusted his defense to handle the run-and-shoot, in which three or four wide receivers spread the defensive backfield from sideline to sideline. The move paid off once already in UMass' 10-10 tie at Holy Cross.

Saturday, however, will prove a tougher test, said Reid.

"I do not the believe that the Holy Cross offense is as good as the BU offense. The BU offense is more explosive," said Ried. "Last year BU put on a clinic for us on how to run the run-and-shoot."

The Terrier's three losses this season can be traced to turnovers and soft defense. Under first-year head coach Dan Allen, BU has yielded 34 points twice and 24 points-per-game on average, ruining some brilliant offensive streaks by Greene, receiver Daren Altieri, and running back Jay Hillman.

In last week's 34-21 loss to Boise State, Greene was 21-33, for 264 yards and 3 touchdowns in the second half. The Terriers buried themselves with four fumbles in the first half, however.

UMass, meanwhile, had an extra week off to work out a few kinks offensively. Quarterback Gary Wilkos ran for 146 yards and a 70-yard touchdown against Maine, but finished 8-25 for 82 yards, 2 TD's and 3 interceptions in the air as the passing game sputtered.

John Johnson was named Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Week after rushing for 97 yards on 22 carries, but fumbled twice and said he took some extra pitches in practice.

Game Notes: The game will be broadcast on WMUA 91.1 FM, WTTT 1430 AM and WSPR AM 1270. BU has not won at Amherst since 1970. The UMass defense has given up 310 yards and 10 points on average in the first two games. Steve Brothers leads the team with 22 tackles.

Soccer: Women away, men home

Women take on Virginia

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The first in a series of plane, train and automobile trips, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team takes on St. Mary's (Cal.) and Virginia in Charlottesville, Va., this weekend.

St. Mary's will be the less intimidating of the two, currently holding a 5-2 record. They shutout San Francisco (4-0) and Chico State (2-0) in their season opener. Their only losses have been to UC-Santa Barbara (4-1) and Stanford (2-1). The Gaels are rolling off a split weekend, victorious over Division II Sonoma State (3-2) while losing to Top 10 Stanford.

Seniors Kim Selby and Susan Von Querner each have five goals for the season. Selby also has three assists and has been named ISAA All-Far West for the past three seasons. Von Querner holds the most points for the team with four assists.

For St. Mary's, this is their longest road trip ever. Of paramount concern for Gael coach Randy Ferris is Virginia's atro-turf field.

Virginia is a formidable force both on paper and on the field. They have five shutouts in their nine victories. Radford (2-0), UNC-Greensboro (4-0), Cincinnati (1-0), William & Mary (2-0) and George Washington (3-0) have all felt the shutout sting of UVA. Other victories have been over George Mason (5-1), NC State (3-2), Maryland (6-1) and Southern Methodist (3-1).

Sophomore Andrea Rubio has the most points for the team with eight goals and assists. Juniors Amanda Cromwell and Tracy DiMillio have 11 points. Cromwell has five goals and one assist while DiMillio has four goals and three assists.

Men host Challenge Cup

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

About 80 men's soccer players from four schools will spend this weekend playing soccer at Upper Boyden Field.

The occasion is the eighth annual Massachusetts Challenge Cup, hosted by the University of Massachusetts men's soccer program.

Rider College (N.J.), Maine and Drexel are the three teams the Minutemen play host to. On Saturday, Maine and Rider face off at noon at Upper Boyden field.

Maine comes into the tourney at 5-2 and ranked fifth in New England. Rider is 3-3.

Saturday's second match pits UMass against Drexel. The Dragons are 3-2, and have scored 11 goals while allowing only three. Senior Jorge Garcia has two goals and four assists to lend the team in scoring.

On Sunday, Maine and Drexel will meet on the Hill at 11 a.m.. For the Black Bears, senior forward Jon Mello appears to be the main man. He has seven goals and two assists in seven games for a total of 16 points, good for second in scoring in New England.

The Minutemen face Rider in Sunday's second game, which kicks off at 1 p.m. The Broncs, like Drexel, hail from the East Coast Conference. Right now, they make a good match for UMass; they are strong defensively, but have had difficulty scoring.

UMass coach Jeff Gettler hopes that this weekend's games will turn around the Minutemen's fortunes. UMass is home after three straight road losses, and will regain the services of Peter Armenti, Dan Lawrence, and Darren Stone. And after all, it's their tournament; UMass has placed second four times and first twice.

"We're looking forward to it," said Gettler. "We're in a must-win situation. The team is focused on winning it."

Field hockey battles ODU

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

This is a game that the University of Massachusetts field hockey team has been looking forward to since last November, when Old Dominion eliminated UMass from the NCAA tournament in the quarterfinal round, 2-1.

This Saturday at noon at Northeastern's Parsons Field in Brookline, UMass and ODU square off in what should be another classic. ODU is currently ranked second in the nation, while the Minutewomen are eighth.

"We need to play our best if we want to win," said Old Dominion coach Beth Anders. "UMass is a good team, I'm very worried about this weekend."

Old Dominion is 7-1-1, and its only loss was to top ranked North Carolina. Junior goalie Kathy Fosina starts in goal for ODU, while Philippa Scott barring gets the nod for UMass.

"We're gonna have to play very well and the key will be execution," Hixon said. "We will not have as many scoring chances as we did against Yale or against Rutgers or against Providence. Old Dominion is a cut above them. We will have some chances, but we're gonna have to execute."

This is a game that UMass is not supposed to win, but the Minutewome go into the game with a lot of momentum, having won five in a row, all by shutouts.

"This is a game that we don't have to be nervous for," Hixon said. "A win or a tie can do nothing but sky rocket us into the top four or five. A loss is not going to hurt us, we're gonna stay right where we are."

Volleyball hosts West Virginia

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend, the UMass women's volleyball team begins an important stretch of matches where it plays four Atlantic 10 teams.

The first of these important matches will be played tonight, at 7 p.m. at Totman Gym, against a very tough West Virginia team.

Just how tough is this West Virginia team? Well on Tuesday the Minutewomen played a great match against Brown University, but eventually lost three games to one.

"We are hoping that, at our lowest level, we play as great a game as we played against Brown," said coach Carol Ford. "That is what we have to do to stay in the match."

While a win against West Virginia tonight "would be a plus" said Ford, the match against Duquesne on Sunday (1 p.m. at Totman) is a "must win" for UMass.

Men's tennis drops second straight

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

They did exactly what they wanted to do. Except win.

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team followed its game plan yesterday, but was defeated on its home court by a fired up Boston University team.

Going into the match, the Minutemen had hoped to win at least three of the singles matches. And they did just that, as UMass' unbeatable number one singles player Barry Wadswoth defeated Larry Grims 7-5, 6-4. Also victorious were UMass' Jeffrey Hechemy, who won in straight sets 6-4, 6-2, and Tim Lipsky, 6-2, 6-3.

All tied at three games apiece, UMass was very confident it could win at least two doubles contests.

Nonetheless, "Thing's don't always happen the way they're supposed to," said Minuteman coach Manny Roberts.

Boston quickly took the match lead 4-3 as Art Mojares and Jerry Copsinis teamed up to dispose of UMass' Paul Audet and Jeffrey Hechemy.

The deciding match was then in the hands of Minutemen Wadsworth and Lipsky, who had not lost a doubles match or a singles contest this season.

Up against their respective singles opponents Grims and Brian Kesselman, Wadsworth and Lipsky were convincingly dropped 6-1, 7-5.

"They got us back from last year," Roberts said.

UMass is now 3-2 as it travels to Vermont on Saturday.

Owners debate keg proposals

By KELLY CONGDON
Collegian Staff

Two recent keg restriction proposals in Amherst have evoked mixed reactions from local liquor stores.

Police Chief Donald N. Maia proposed to the Amherst Select Board last Monday that liquor stores be required to place a serial numbered tag on all kegs sold to help police identify adults who purchase alcohol for underaged drinkers.

Stores would collect an additional $50 deposit on tagged kegs which will be be forfeited to the town's Drug Abuse Resistence Education program if the keg is returned without the tag. According to Amherst officials, the policy will only be approved if surrounding towns also accept the measure.

Maia also suggested the outright banning of kegs in Amherst.

Although some store owners conceded that implementation of keg restrictions would be welcome, other liquor stores believe that such restrictions are an infringement of consumer rights.

Several stores are concerned about the effects restrictive policies would have on local business. "If the policy is not universal, we will be at a competitive disadvantage and lose our business to other towns. Buyers will not be willing to pay an additional $50 deposit when they can travel to Hadley or Belchertown and not pay it," said Scott Forbes of Scott's Liquors in Amherst.

Other local liquor store establishments support the more restrictive measures and said that keg restrictions are a means of insuring profits. "In a way, kegs should be banned altogether," said Steve Snover of Liquors 44 in South Hadley. "It would cut down keg sales, but people would still purchase cases. I would rather sell seven cases than one keg. It's more profitable," he said.

Marvin Spence, owner of Spirit Haus in Amherst, said that the use of tags and the additional $50 deposit would eliminate some underaged drinking. Spence opposes the outright banning of kegs in Amherst, however, and said such a proposal is a violation of consumer rights.

"Banning kegs would definitely be a problem. It's not fair to discriminate against a person who wants to buy a keg," said Spence.

Rival Liberian rebel groups battle

MONROVIA, Liberia (AP) — Rebel leader Prince Johnson said yesterday that his fighters have begun attacking forces of rival guerrilla chief Charles Taylor, who he accused of violating a week-long cease-fire.

Johnson also said he planned to capture, court-martial, and execute soldiers of slain President Samuel Doe found guilty of war crimes.

People who "committed a lot of atrocities and slaughtered so many innocent civilians cannot be given any clemency" he said.

A precarious truce between four armies in Monrovia — declared by Taylor on Sept. 22 — was endangered by heavy artillery fire Friday and increased shooting Friday night and yesterday in the city center.

Johnson said Taylor's men twice in two days had attacked his forces, and that he ordered his men to fight back yesterday.

Taylor's army has overrun most of Liberia, but he has been unable to capture the capital city and presidential mansion that is the seat of government.

Trapped in the heavily fortified mansion are remnants of Doe's army, who Johnson threatened to attack. The remarks from Johnson, who controls most of downtown Monrovia, appeared aimed at provoking an attack on Taylor by the fourth army, a five-nation West African army sent to enforce a truce.

"ECOMOG (the West African force) is delaying peace in this country," Johnson told reporters. "The problem now is with ECOMOG, which is supposed to deploy its troops in the war zones now that there is a cease-fire and clear those who violate the cease-fire."

All three Liberian armies have slaughtered more than 5,000 civilians since Taylor invaded from Ivory coast on Dec. 24 to oust Doe.

GALA to celebrate 3rd homecoming

By ALI WOOLWICH
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian alumni/ae association (GALA) will focus on the needs of lesbian, bisexual and gay students, past and present, during its third annual homecoming weekend reunion, October 13 and 14.

UMass GALA, founded in the spring of 1987, was part of a mid-80s wave of similar organizations which formed at colleges and universities throughout the country as part of the ongoing lesbian, bisexual, and gay civil rights movement. The UMass group organized its first homecoming in 1988, during the University's 125th anniversary celebration.

This year's theme, "Reunion of the Decades," will highlight the start of GALA's UMass Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay History Project. The progression of the LBG movement at the University will be documented through participants' stories of campus life and campus struggles.

Also during the reunion weekend, GALA's Board of Directors will meet to finalize the group's bylaws and have them approved by the general membership of over 100 members.

Some of GALA's goals include: providing social and professional networking opportunities among its membership; promoting an atmosphere of greater understanding and cooperation between GALA's members and the larger UMass community; fostering a continuing University awareness of the needs of LBG students and alumni/ae; supporting, when appropriate, the goals and activities of the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance, the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, and other campus groups; and promoting

Fed budget compromise reached; $134B in new taxes

Congress avoids cuts

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush and congressional leaders on Sunday forged a $500-billion, five-year compromise package of tax increases and spending cuts, spurring Congress to quick action on a stopgap spending measure needed to avoid slashes in federal services Monday.

The House approved the temporary financing bill just three hours after the budget agreement was described by President Bush in a Rose Garden announcement, and the Senate quickly followed.

"It is balanced, it is fair, and in my view it is what the United States of America needs at this point in its history," Bush said in announcing an agreement that concluded budget negotiations that began in May.

The package contained $134 billion in new tax revenues, including new taxes on gasoline, cigarettes, alcohol and luxury items. Medicare costs for the elderly and disabled were increased; defense spending was slashed as well.

On a 382-41 vote, the House passed what is called a continuing appropriations resolution to keep the government operating at full speed through next Friday while lawmakers weigh the proposed budget compromise.

The resolution, which then passed the Senate by voice vote, also includes $2 billion in new appropriations for the educational civic and charitable activities within the lesbian, bisexual and gay community.

Topics of concern for the group right now are the furthered institutionalization of the PGLBC, anti-gay ROTC policies on campus, and UMass faculty/staff hiring practices.

Rob Ranney, a local GALA Boardmember, pointed out that while some alumni/ae groups are more social in nature, UMass GALA is more service oriented. "I want to help make it better for lesbian, bisexual and gay students at UMass," said Ranney.

Sutton fight confirmed

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police last week confirmed that former University of Massachsetts basketball star Lorenzo Sutton was involved in an altercation before being struck by a car a week ago Sunday.

Sutton, 25, remains in critical condition at Bay State Medical Center in Springfield as a result of head injuries he sustained in the accident.

The Collegian incorrectly reported last week that Sutton was being being chased at the time of the accident. According to Amherst Police, Sutton was chasing a man at the time he was struck in the traveler's lane of North Pleasant Street.

The driver of the car, Jean Kokoszka, 21, a junior at UMass, was cited for leaving the scene of a personal injury accident and operating to endanger.

Dukakis announces plan to close Soldiers Home

By KELLY CONGDON
Collegian Staff

The Holyoke Soldiers Home, a nursing home for disabled veterans, is the latest casualty of a new round of budget cuts.

Gov. Dukakis announced Wednesday that the Soldier's Home and another home in Chelsea would be closed as part of $310 million in budget cuts instituted in August.

The closing will change the lives of the aged veterans who have made a home of the facility for many years.

Although the doors will officially close at the Soldier's Home on December 31, it is still unclear where state officials intend to send the disabled veterans. The home will be gradually phased out by transferring patients to other facilities in the state.

According to state Secretary of Health and Human Services Philip Johnston, no decisive plan has been formulated as to where the 243 residents of the home will be relocated.

"Some would go to nursing homes or rest homes and others will be placed in state facilities. In any case, during the period between now and December 1, we will be making plans to move patients," he said.

"Some patients may be transferred to nursing homes with Medicaid, though the number of patients eligible for such transfers are limited since tighter Medicaid requirements are also part of the governor's plan," Johnston added.

Employees of the facility claim the closing merely adds insult to injury since the governor has continually cut the budget of the home over the past few years.

The home currently serves the four western Massachusetts counties. People who were on active duty during wartime are eligible for treatment at the facility regardless of whether the disability is related to military service.

The proposed closing has been under attack by local representatives who allege that closing the home will not save money but shift the cost of the veteran's care to other areas of the budget since Massachusetts General Law requires municipalities to care for veterans who need medical care.

Johnston disputed this claim, stating that the closing of the two homes and the transfer of those veterans to other state facilities would save the state $5 million.

"The governor only has the authority to cut limited areas without legislative authorization. The decision had to be made quickly since the Governor had to reduce expenditures by $310 million to keep the state afloat," said Johnston.

"We're working hard to avoid closing the home, but nothing will be clear until the legislature is back in session. The state would have to produce $5 million in other savings if the Holyoke Soldiers Home were to be saved," he said.

Johnston admitted that closing the facility would be difficult, but in light of the fiscal crisis, he said the cuts were unavoidable. "People need to understand that our choices are limited. We could either shut down UMass or make other difficult cuts," he said.

State officials announced on Friday that the closing may be delayed three months until April 1 due to mounting support by veteran groups.

Sport of nobles reigns at UMass

Graceful, elegant fencing offered as a course

By KIM FRISINO
Collegian Staff

An "elegant" sport once thought to be only for the rich nobles of Europe has made a resurgance at the University of Massachusetts.

The sport of fencing is offered as accredited courses, a registered student organization and a competitive team.

Fencing is an elegant and romantic pastime which was required training for young nobles in Russia, Germany, France, and some other mid-European countries to teach them how to fight without the threat of bodily harm, according to instructor Joe Swales.

Competitors still respectfully salute each other before each match, and shake hands at its end, keeping with the honorable and chivalrous tone of the sport, Swales said.

Fencing was also one of the original five Modern Olympic events, according to a fencing club member.

UMass undergraduate instructors teach four one-credit classes; three at the elementary level (Fencing I) and one at the advanced level (Fencing II). Each class has an enrollment of 20-30 people.

Swales said fencing is outstanding aerobic exercise and gives one a sense of personal challenge and pride. "It's also lots of fun," he added.

Other club members said they find the activity to be an effective stress outlet.

According to Swales, the fencing team is competitive with several major colleges and universities in the Northeast, including Fairfield University, Worcester Polytech, Connecticut and Harvard. It also participates at the collegiate level in the New Englands every year.

Although men and women oppose each other in classes and the club, there are separate divisions for each sex when participating in official competitions.

In addition, while men use the saber, epee, and foil, women may use only the foil (a smaller "sword" with a protective tip) when competing at the collegiate level. This practice is changing, however, said Swales.

Judging at official meets is done electronically; special jackets and weapons equipped with sensing wires and devices are worn by the fencers, he said.

The club offers people the opportunity to fence with people of different abilities and sharpen their skills, he said. Anyone with an interest should attend a club meeting.

Meetings are held Monday through Thursday in Totman Gym, room 202 from 7 to 10 p.m.

Project Pride seeks to unify campus

By HEIDI BABINSKI
Collegian Correspondent

Project Pride, according to founder Michael Wall, was created to unite school spirit and campus concerns.

Wall, a graduate student in the School of Education, said he got the idea while working with the Alumni Reunion Office and the Adelphia group, an organization helping to better the University.

"You look at some of the Big Eight or Big Ten schools across the country with 45,000-55,000 students and they're just going nuts," Wall said. "School spirit used to be very big on this campus, especially when the Revelers, a pep-squad formed in 1962, were around. I saw the need to start a group which in my opinion covered the two basic elements of college life; school spirit, which the Revelers used to do, and campus concerns, which the Adelphia group used to perform," Wall said.

Some of Project Pride's campus concern tasks include Operation Identification, in coordination with the police department and the Division of Public Safety and helping with campus conservation issues.

"On the school spirit side we work with the athletic department, mostly with the men's basketball team and coach Calipari, and the football team with coach Reid," Wall said.

"Working with the cheerleaders and the band, Project Pride is trying to increase crowd enthusiasm and attendance at the games."

The excitement Wall said he is looking for comes through crowd cheers, which "aren't nearly as popular as they used to be on this campus," he said.

In aiding his pleas, the Athletic department bought Project Pride large plastic signs to help in stimulating the crowd's liveliness.

Pam Batalis, a graduate in sports management, helps Wall distribute flyers and come up with slogans for the games.

"On my side of the coin I put together flyers for particular games, and with the help of the band and Project Pride we're trying to increase awareness about home games no matter what the sport is. We try to get the attendance up which we think will get enthusiasm up," Batalis said.

Batalis and Wall both feel that the Northeast is known more for its academic prowess rather than its athletic bravery, which may be one reason for the decreasing crowd enthusiasm. Their goal is to breed school spirit in each crop of first-year students so that down the line, UMass will have a supportive student body.

In order to get people to go the games, Batalis has come up with various "promotion" ideas to get the crowd involved during half time.

She hopes to get the fraternities and other organizations together for a goal shoot, for which the the winners would get donated prizes.

Feminine mascots — a problem with the Mountain 'dear'

Picture this scenario.

Curry Hicks Cage. 11:59 p.m.. Encompassing the gym are thousands of screaming fans. The Minutemen are about to come bursting through the locker rooms doors. The Cage is full of anticipation. Anticipation of what?

Of us. The fans in the bleachers with red painted faces and miniature hoops on our heads. The fans who dieheartedly come pysched and pumped to watch great basketball.

The clock strikes twelve and Midnight Madness has begun.

The sound in the Cage is deafening. The band is playing their loudest as the fans cheer in accompaniment. Each player bounces out onto the court. Some younger fans cover their ears from the high intensity of volume blanketing the atmosphere.

Amidst the roar of the cheers, the Minuteman Mascot is scurrying around the Cage eager to start a Wave. Fans tune in and the inside of Curry Hicks soon resembles an ocean of waves.

The Minutemen are practicing their dunks for the contest. The crowd responds whole-heartedly with every dunk.

Suddenly the crowd is silent.

All heads turn toward a section of fans behind one basket. Standing in the middle of the ruckus, our mascot stands still, holding the Minuteman rifle in his . . .

"Oh my God, out Minuteman is a Minutewoman!"

Decked from head to toe in a Minuteman costume is none other than a female — a Minute "woman".

"What's going on !?!" exclaims a confused fan.

"Is this some sort of joke?" another intervenes.

Felice Cohen

Could this really happen at our school? Would it matter if the person dressed up to represent our team was a male or female?

Maybe not at UMass, but. . .

. . .at West Virginia University their mascot, the Mountaineer, is none other than a female, and what some are responding to as a "Mountain Deer."

For first time in their school's history, the school has chosen a woman to be the mascot at their games. What is so bad about that?

For years, fans, the majority being men, have encouraged the idea of women cheering on the teams. Female cheerleaders are never hasseled as they bounce around supporting their team. The goals, both for cheerleaders and mascots, seem very similar — keeping the morale up of the fans and the teams.

So why should the mascot, just because she's a woman, be put through so much negative criticism for doing her job? I hardly see a problem with this woman running around dressed as a Mountaineer, except of course maybe because she is not wearing what they expect — a short skirt.

Suddenly fans from out of the woodwork are responding very negatively to their new mascot.

Despite throwing paper ice and cups at her during the games, she understands that the maltreatment she receives is not directed at her, but at the entire idea of having a female Mountaineer. What courage she has, but of course, she is a Mountaineer!

All of the responses are not negative. Some have had sweatshirts made up with a woman dressed like Daniel Boone on the front. The school newspaper is also behind her.

It's hard to imagine a University making such a big deal about their mascot. I could understand it if the team was doing poorly.

It's bad enough that as women we cannot go outside alone at night, but are we going to need chaperones on the playing fields. or in the locker rooms (as in Foxboro)?

Midnight Madness is only a few weeks away. How will you react if our mascot comes abounding on the floor as a Minutewoman?

Think about it.

The basics of survival

Anyone attending this University for even the shortest time has learned the basics of survival. I told my brother, a freshman at this illustrious school, that if he remembered two laws he could get through the every day nonsense and absurdity of this place.

The first is the Law of UMass: If you don't understand something, it's just UMass, ignore it and most likely it will disappear into the irrelevant cloud of which it blossomed.

Preston P. Forman

The second law is actually a corollary to the first law. It is simply called the Corollary to UMass: Don't take anything they tell you too seriously and always keep it in mind that they will lie to you so take everything they tell you as at least a half-lie. And here's the good part — the antecedent of "they" can be anyone in an official University position.

A paranoid view? Yes, but one frighteningly clear and correct. Just spend a few years here.

As they say on those Wild Kingdom-type shows, join me as we explore the fascinating world of the University of Massachusetts.

Timm Rinehart, director of Undergraduate Admissions, announced last week a new program aimed at drawing some 500 transfer students and 100 new students to Amherst to raise revenue lost through budget cuts.

To fill the youngins in, last fall University officials with much hand-wringing and prophesies of damage to the school, very publicly announced that no transfer or new students would be admitted to the University in the spring.

Why? To save money.

So this semester, more bodies in the residence halls mean more dough in the bank accounts. Okay, I understand it but only because I memorized the Law and the Corollary.

If I was a cynic, I would predict Rinehart will announce sometime next September a plan to recruit out-of-state students. Muddling his way through a quote, I imagine him bragging about how much a head these suckers are worth (a second ring at the great cash register at the Bursar's Office).

But besides all this I have a sarcastically native question: Who will come to this University next spring fully aware of what the men with the bats in Boston have done to us so far?

Even placing the monster clean-your-clocks Citizen. for Limited Taxation petition aside, this University has taken three 4 percent cuts in two months. That's, oh, in the ballpark of $15 million. Last week alone as UMass administrators were just getting around to dealing with the Sept. 4 slashing, the Executive Office of Finance and Accounts "shut down" University accounts. And took $5.3 million appropriated for this campus while they were at it.

C'mon, where is Admissions going to find 600 Massachusetts-ignorant men and women. Rinehart himself admitted that Admissions missed its freshman recruiting mark by over a 1,000 students this year.

Who would be willing to come here fully aware of section eliminations, course reductions and support cuts?

What does Admissions plan to do? Lie?

Everywoman's Center suffocated by cuts

The Everywoman's Center is taking its last breath. Six out of nine programs have been eliminated in the past three years. These programs provided essential services to University and community woman.

Legal Advocacy, cut in 1987, offered advocacy and legal assistance. Women's Admission and General Education Support (WAGES), cut in 1988, provided advocacy and support for non-traditional students and women returning to school. In 1989, the Working Women's program was cut, which used to give sexual harassment advocacy and career counseling to working women. The Bridge program, cut in 1990, offered advocacy and programs for women affected by multiple oppression.

A few weeks ago, the Counseling programs and Public Relations and Outreach were also eliminated. The Counseling Program provided free support groups and a space where women and their partners could get counseling in a supportive and confidential environment. Public Relations and Outreach was responsible for publicizing EWC events, maintaining visibility and accessibility. Clearly, the Everywoman's Center, formerly the third largest women's center in the United States, is in the process of being dismantled by the administration.

Provost O'Brien, President-Chancellor Duffey, and Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Madson have shown their lack of commitment to women. The EWC has been disproportionately targeted not only in the most recent round of cuts, but in the past three years as well. In fiscal year '91, the Student Affairs budget was reduced by 5 percent, while the EWC budget suffered a 23 percent reduction, and unlike most programs, it is staffed primarily by volunteers. Obviously, the administration does not consider women to be "central to the mission of the University."

Considering the forthcoming budget cuts, we are concerned about the fate of the three remaining programs: Resource and Referral maintains and develops an information and referral systems which includes health, legal, social, and political resources available to women. The Educator advocates provide training and workshops for groups who want to combat violence against women. The Counselor Advocates staff a 24-hour crisis hotline for victims of male violence.

Women and minorities are integral to the diversity of UMass. Do not suffocate us.

Shock therapy

Her eyes open and she knows something is not right. Her head is a muffled cloud, save for the spike which hammers through it intermittently.

However, this is the normal result of a night of party hopping. She assumes she was luggage as early as nine o'clock. But just because a handle had been strapped to her did not mean the drinks had ceased to flow.

David Erickson

As she props herself up on her elbows she recalls the guy she had met. Maybe it was even later, somewhere off-campus? His name was John, that she knew, but his appearance, her mind's eye could not summon.

Apparently this information had been jettisoned along with however many brain cells the alcohol had killed. He had been hot, really gorgeous. On top of that he had been so sincere, so swee—...

With dawning horror she surveys herself. The mid-afternoon light cascades through her bedroom window, illuminating her dorm room, her bed, her body.

Her mind races to remember, to recall the previous night's events, but she cannot.

The girl's blouse has been torn open and her bra twisted, ripped off of her when awkward, drunken hands failed to unhook it.

Her pantyhose and panties are down around her ankles and her black leather skirt is hitched up way beyond her knees. Her heels are still on.

Her pulse quickens and the freshman feels cold, she feels so cold. She struggles with the blackness in her mind. Forcibly, she tries to pull an inkling of recollection from her handicapped memory.

When did I get home? Who came home with me? Was it John? Why did I—? How—?

Nothing.

Panic rising, the young girl throws herself to the carpet-covered floor. She thinks crazily of how her mom said it made the room "so much homier."

On her hands and knees she crawls to the trashcan beside her desk. In it is a mixture of crumpled notes, old Domino's coupons, a few empty beer cans.

Gripping the cold, black wastecan she flips it over and shakes the contents onto the floor. She does not notice the bruises on her knuckles, the soreness between her thighs, nor does she feel the sharp black and blue mark under her eye where a ringed fist, seeking submission, had struck her.

Stale drops of beer riddle the floor and her bare knees. Empty, she hurls the trash container across the room, next to her roommate's desk. Ellen had had to go home for the weekend. Death in the family.

She prays she will find what she is looking for. She knows she will. She has to. If she finds it she will at least know she is safe. She will know the bastard is not still inside her. She finds nothing.

She searches the other trash barrel. Then she ransacks the room. When she's done she seeks refuge in her bed. She pulls her quilt around her. Her mother made the quilt. She gathers her knees to her chest and braces her chin against them.

She wants to cry, she needs to cry, yet no tears fall. She feels dry, empty, alone, and violated.

Deep down she knows she must have cried all night long.

Project Pride recently organized parades around campus on the Fridays before home football games, with cheerleaders, a banner and a few band members.

"We want the students to see the image of school spirit. . . and we want them to know what's going on. We want students to be more aware of the game, help them to become interested enough to come to the games, and to try to make them have a good enough time while they're at the game so they'll want to go again," Wall said.

Police investigate theft of decal, cash

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN

University Police are investigating the theft of a parking decal and an unspecified amount of cash from a motor vehicle on Thursday.

The parking office reported that the decal was recovered.

In other police reports from the Thursday and Friday logs:

ARRESTS

● Police arrested two men Thursday on John Adams Drive for various liquor violations.

William P. Andrews, 20, of Sudbury, was arrested for possession of a liquor identification card of another person. Richard E. Mines, 18, of Framingham, was arrested for several liquor law violations and using false information to obtain a driver's license.

● Officers arrested Tedric Feist Eiseman, 19, of Pelham, early Friday morning for possession of marijuana after officers observed him smoking the substance.

● Douglas J. Charest, 20, of West Springfield, was arrested Friday morning for possession of an altered driver's license after police saw him toss a beer can to the ground.

● Officers placed a 37-year-old man Thursday evening into protective custody at Knowlton. Police were called by security because the intoxicated man was attempting to break into the hall.

LARCENY

● A box delivered to the lobby of Dickinson Residence Hall was stolen Thursday, police said. The box contained a sweater and several mugs. The estimated value is $95.

VANDALISM

● Police reported that the rear window of a motor vehicle in Lot 34 was smashed Friday. The trunk of the car was also damaged. The estimated value is $350.

ARTS & LIVING

Lend Me a Tenor makes for a pleasantly amusing evening

By JEN SIEGEL
Collegian Correspondent

Lend Me a Tenor
Fine Arts Center
Saturday, Sept. 29

Lend Me A Tenor, a comedy by Ken Ludwig, was performed at the Fine Arts Center Saturday and Sunday nights. The play, about a world-renowned opera tenor, his wife, and a few of the people who run the opera company for which he will be performing Othello, is set in a hotel suite in 1934.

Tito Merelli, the tenor, ends the first act by being presumed dead. He really has just taken too many sleeping pills, but his untimely "death" forces Max, the assistant to the general manager of the opera company, to take over the roles of both Othello in the performance and Tito in "real" life.

While Max is performing, Tito awakes and things get very confusing for all the characters as the two Tito Merellis run around Cleveland and the hotel suite.

The first act was pleasantly amusing, but the second act, with all the confusion over the mistaken identity, was hilarious. The humor was both clever and situational, and it made for a great combination.

All the actors performed well, but D'Jamin Bartlett, as Tito's wife, was excellent although her part was small. Justine Johnston as the chairwoman of the opera guild was perfectly cast as a loud, large, and overbearing society type.

Both Ron Holgate, as Tito, and Michael Waldron, as Max, performed well and seemed to be in sync with each other.

REVIEW

The Othello costumes were wonderfully loud. The curtain call, in which all the cast members run through the big moments of the play in high speed, was very clever.

The only problem with Lend Me a Tenor was inherent to the play itself. It's never clear whether Max intended to kill Tito when he puts barbituates in his drink or just put him to sleep. Max never wonders if he was the one responsible for Tito's untimely "death."

There were many strings left untied at the end, but if what you wanted was amusement, not a great social statement or coherent plot, then Lend Me A Tenor was wonderful.

The making of a record label

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

"Actually, I killed the pigs myself. I killed them with an average machete and drained all the blood into a large vat. I just taped a funnel to the pigs and slit them open. Then, I swallowed the blood and regurgitated it on to the album sleeves," Mark Sturm, part owner of the Vertical record label, said in describing how he went about decorating the album sleeves of the label's first release, the Piece Man EP by Cop Shoot Cop.

Each album sleeve is in fact splattered with pig's blood with a picture of a snub nosed pistol on the other side. It was done so at the request of the band. But, it wasn't done in the fashion described above. The pig's blood was procured from a butcher. Then, Todd Ashley, Cop Shoot Cop's lead singer, and Jim Sottile, another Vertical cohort, filled an airhose with the blood and sprayed approximately 1,500 album sleeves. This was not without its health hazards. Sottile, who wasn't wearing a mask at the time he sprayed the album sleeves, became very ill and had to receive several penicillin shots.

This is not a hoax, nor is it a script for the latest David Lynch venture. This is very real. Sturm and Sottile, along with Mark Viesta, Phil Straub and Tony Proccacino decided to put the Vertical label together back in the summer of 1989. But when asked to give exact details about how all of this came about, Sturm, Viesta and Straub each gave their own conflicting story.

"It was my brain child back in July of 1986," Sturm claims. "I conceived the whole thing. Basically it's me and then there's four other people that use the name as a way to gain notoriety."

But Viesta claims, "This is what happened. One day I was thinking that we should start a record company. So me and Tony went to have breakfast at the Classe Cafe. So I said, 'Tony, you know a lot of people. Why don't we start a record label?' Tony said, 'Alright, that's a great idea. We don't even need that much money.' So i said, 'Check it out, I was reading this article in Forced Exposure where they'll press records for us.'

"He called Phil, Phil called Mark, we talked to Jim and we were down with it. We all gave in some money. We found a band. We got the capital and we put it out."

Straub claims that it was all his idea since he had been reared to be a great record mogul as his father and his grandfather before him. He adds that the reason the group decided to dub the record label Vertical was because "Neutered Kitty Bitches" was too long of a title, while Viesta contends that the name has something to do with basketball.

The group bases the label's operations out of Amherst, Northampton, Washington, D.C. and New Jersey. Sturm, Viesta and Straub, all current UMass students and members of WMUA campus radio, are the Amherst/Northampton link, while Proccacino, a UMass and WMUA alumnus, operates out of his home in New Jersey and Sottile, also a UMass and WMUA alumnus, works out of Washington, D.C.

When asked what the basic purpose of the label was, Sturm replied, "We take bands that are relatively unheard of, slap them into into the format of vinyl seven inch singles and sell these copies to distributors who sell them on a national and sometimes international circuit. We make the records through an independent pressing company. Jim handles that. We give them the music 'loosely termed' and the artwork, also loosely defined, and they print up the product, which is also loosely defined."

Their first seven inch, the Cop Shoot Cop EP, was released in December of 1989. Procaccino, who grew up with Cop Shoot Cop's lead singer Todd Ashley, was responsible for finding the group, who had previously released Head Kick Facismile on the Japanese label Supernatural Organization. Vertical produced 5,000 copies and sold all but approximately 200 of those copies.

Their second release by the Royal Trux, an antimusician type band that they discovered in D.C., has completely sold out. But don't be fooled by the success of their releases, this has not proved to be a money making venture for them.

As they look forward to their third release, Sebadoh's Asshole seven inch single, Sturm said that he hoped the label would reach the point where they could release singles simultaneously, while Viesta claimed he just wanted an all-expense paid vacation out of the whole deal and Straub was enthused to do something with Air Supply.

Sturm offered his advice to future record industry entrepreneurs. "If you want to do this you need a lot of money and you need to come up with something that will sell. It doesn't matter if it sucks. That'll probably sell better."

Mapplethorpe trial under way

CINCINNATTI (AP) — Defense attorneys in an art gallery obscenity trial will try to convince a jury this week that there is more to Robert Mapplethorpe's pictures than meets the eye.

But the prosecution, which launched its case last week against the Contemporary Arts Center and its director, Dennis Barrie, will tell an eight-member Hamilton County Municipal Court jury that some of the late artists's photographs are obscene and have little artistic value.

After four days of jury selection, the prosecution's first two witnesses took the stand Friday to testify against the gallery and Barrie.

Both are charged with pandering obscenity and using children in nudity-related material.

Testimony, which resumes Monday, is expected to continue all next week.

In his opening statement Friday, Barrie's attorney talked to jurors about Robert Mapplethorpe: The Perfect Moment, the 175-photo exhibit that resulted in indictments against Barrie and the gallery in April. The exhibit is currently in Boston.

"It had serious value, both from its artistic, technical aspects but also as to its political (statement)," said H. Louis Sirkin. "It showed us a world that did exist, that perhaps still exists...a period of American history in the 1970s which we may never ever have again, and perhaps should never have again."

The gallery and Barrie were indicted on the basis of seven photographs in the exhibit. Two show children with their genitals exposed, and five others display sexually explicit acts involving male adults.

If convicted of both charges, Barrie could be sentenced to one year in jail and fined $2,000.

The gallery could be fined $10,000 if convicted on both counts.

"There was controversy, but there was only one intent and purpose . . . to add to the cultural enhancement of the citizens of this city and this area," he said. "It was brought here not to appeal to anyone's prurient interest. It was brought here to teach and to show the world this brilliant photographer and some of the inner makings of that man and some of the torture that, perhaps, he suffered."

But the prosecutor in the nation's first obscenity trial of an art gallery countered that the case hinges solely on the seven photographs.

"The state's case is,in some respects, very simple," said Assistant City Prosecutor Frank Prouty. "The pictures are the state's case...The issue is not the First Amendment. The issue is obscenity; the issue is also displaying pictures of children in the state of nudity."

Sirkin previously had told jurors that Mapplethorpe was a homosexual and that some of the photographs in the exhibit depicted sexually explicit acts.

"It was a retrospective...a biography of an individual by showing his works," Sirkin said. "This particular photographer not only did beautiful pictures, he also did some other pictures that are not so beautiful. But they were pictures of the real world to him, a world that he was surrounded by and he was a part of."

Mapplethorpe, 42, died of AIDS in March 1989.

Inroads interns gain corporate step in school

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — When Afafia Smith of Harvard Street graduates from Southeastern Massachusetts University in 1994, she will have more than a degree.

The 17-year-old Cathedral High School graduate, who plans to major in business information systems, will be able to offer prospective employers a resume that includes experience in the business world.

Smith is one of 13 Springfield youths who have been selected to participate in Inroads, a nation-wide career development program for talented minority youths.

Inroads offers college-bound African-American, Hispanic and native Americanf youths the opportunity to combine their formal education with hands-on experience in the work force through four-year summer internships at local corporations.

"The goal is to place talented minority youth in the business and industry and prepare them for corporate and community leadership," said Charles Lawson, staff specialist for Inroads.

The program is aimed at students interested in careers in buiness and industry.

The internships combine summer work experience and community service with year-round academic instruction, training and guidance from Inroads counselors.

Students are selected to participate in the program after interviewing with the corporate sponsor.

To be eligible for the program, students must maintain at least a 3.0 grade average in high school and have a combined score of 1,000 on their Scholastic Aptitude Test.

Sox lose finale; lead is one game

BOSTON (AP) — Fred McGriff led Toronto's 19-hit barrage with four singles and the Blue Jays charged back to within one game of Boston in the American League East, roughing up the Red Sox 10-5 Sunday.

The Blue Jays salvaged the finale of a three-game series and prevented Boston from clinching a share of the division title. Toronto now finishes the regullar season with three games at Baltimore while the Red Sox are home for the last three against Chicago.

The Blue Jays blew an early 4-1 lead and after Boston tied it, they broke it open with three runs in the fifth and three more in the seventh.

McGriff helped Toronto to a 1-0 lead in the first, had an RBI single during a three-run second and added a two-run single in the fifth.

Jimmy Key (13-7) allowed nine hits, including Tom Brunansky's fifth homer in three days, and five runs in 6 2-3 innings. He gave way in the seventh to Jim Acker after Jody Reed got his third hit.

Joe Hesketh (0-4), the second Boston pitcher, took the loss, surrendering a tie-breaking homer to Junior Felix, his 15th, in the fifth.

Boston starter Greg Harris (6-0) lasted just 1 2-3 innings, allowing four runs on five hits and two walks.

Hesketh replaced Harris, but wilted after Boston pulled into a 4-all tie with two runs in the fourth. Hesketh gave up eight hits and three runs.

Boston scored on doubles by Pena and Carlos Quintana in the second, then made it 4-4 in the fourth on a sacrifice fly by Dwight Evans and a single by Pena.

fend for himself through the air all afternoon. With the element of surprise gone from the run-and-shoot, the Terriers finished with 292 total yards on offense.

"In the past the run-and-shoot might have been something that we feared, but now we're getting out after it," said senior safety Vaughn Williams.

Allen Williams led the Minutemen with 11 tackles and Caparotti added nine, including a spectacular trip-up of BU's Jerome Tomlin on a 78-yard kickoff return following UMass' first score.

Men's tennis smashed by Vermont

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The winning ways of the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team have abruptly come to a halt.

After beginning the season with three promising wins, the Minutemen have suddenly fallen to 3-3, as they dropped their third straight on Saturday to the University of Vermont.

UMass' number two singles player, Jeff Hechemy, was the only singles player to bring home a victory as he defeated Vermont's Clay Hamlin in straight sets 6-3, 6-2. The rest of the team was able to pull off only a handful of games in singles play.

The contest of the day proved to be a battle between UMass' number one singles player, Barry Wadsworth, and UVM's Scott Stern. The two have been rivals for the past few years in both the regular season and tournament play. On Saturday, Stern was able to edge out a 7-5, 4-6, 6-3 victory.

The loss was Wadsworth's first of the season. Also having his undefeated streak stopped was freshman Minuteman Tim Lipsky, who was trounced 6-1, 6-2 by David Stechlow.

"What goes around, comes around," said Minuteman coach Manny Roberts, referring to last year's match in which UMass easily defeated UVM at home.

"I expected it to be a tough match," said Roberts."They're a veteran team with all their starters back from last year."

Tough matches loom for UMass. The Minutemen take on Providence, Hartford and Franklin Pierce in the upcoming weeks.

UMass will try to get back into the swing of things and prove to other New England teams that it's still a formidable force as the Minutemen travel to Providence today for a 3 p.m. matchup.

"It's going to be a war at Providence," said Roberts.

On the Baseline: Wadsworth and Hechemy lead the singles teams in wins with five each and one loss.

Tumultuous week ends in 37-13 loss for Pats

Kiam nixes rumor of GM's demise

FOXBORO (AP) — The black cloud over the New England Patriots got even darker Sunday.

A 37-13 rout by the New York Jets was piled on the turmoil over a female reporter's claim she was sexually harassed by several Patriots players.

"It's tough to block it out," New England wide receiver Sammy Martin said.

While his Patriots were getting whipped, owner Victor Kiam shot down speculation — fueled by his own statement Sunday that he planned major management changes — that general manager Patrick Sullivan would be fired.

But in this strange season, there was a bizarre bright spot for the Patriots: fewer than one-third of the 36,724 spectators who filed into the stadium were still there to see the dismal ending.

Those who stayed saw a revitalized Jets offense led by a veteran quarterback and three rookies.

Ken O'Brien completed 19 of 28 passes for 282 yeards and a touchdown. Brad Baxter rushed for two touchdowns, Blair Thomas had his first 100-yard game, rushing for exactly 100 yards, and Rob Moore caught nine passes for 175 yards, including a 69-yard score. Pat Leahy added field goals of 18, 24 and 46 yards.

"We stubbed our toe last week," New York coach Bruce Coslet said. "We did what I thought we could do this week."

It was easy for the Jets (2-2) to forget last Monday night's 30-7 loss to Buffalo. It was impossible for the Patriots (1-3) to forget the uproar stemming from the incident 13 days earlier involving Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson.

"We have not made much progress," said Patriot coach Rod Rust, a 41-7 loser in Cincinnati a week earlier. "The turmoil, whatever it is, we're going to have to take it and we're going to have to succeed."

The woes of New England mounted early as the Jets scored on their first possession. Baxter's 1-yard run capped an 11-play, 54-yard drive.

"We jumped on them early. We knew we had to do that," Coslet said. The Patriots allowed their opponent to score on four of their first five possessions for the second consecutive game.

"We just didn't get untracked," Patriot wide receiver Irving Fryar said.

Baxter added a 28-yard touchdown run in the third quarter, making the score 31-6 after Michael Mayes' first NFL interception.

Kyle Clifton picked off aother of Marc Wilson's passes and returned it 39 yards to the New England 3. Four plays later, Leahy kicked his 18-yard field goal, increasing the margin to 34-6 with 1:36 left in the third period.

UMass offense racks up 47 points, routs BU

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, the University of Massachusetts answered the question how good could this football team be if it put together an offense to match its outstanding defense?, as the Minutemen romped over Boston University 47-16 in front of 8,247 fans at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen scored five touchdowns, netted 378 yards rushing and 570 yards total on the day, while the 'Even Silver Slide Adjust' defense stifled its second run-and-shoot team of the season. BU was held to minus-1 yard rushing and Terrier quarterback Stan Greene was harassed into a relatively harmless 22-47, 242-yard, one-touchdown afternoon.

For UMass, freshman tailback John Johnson rushed for 128 yards and two touchdowns and quarterback Gary Wilkos completed 13 of 18 passes for 198 yards, and ran for 106 more.

The win raises the Minutemen to 2-0-1 on the season and 2-0 in the Yankee Conference. BU drops to 1-4, 0-2.

"This game belongs to our offense," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "From the outset, our offensive line did a wonderful job.

"We played crisp offensive football. We put it together."

Said Johnson, "We felt that the run-and-shoot was a powerful offense, and we'd have to get a lot of points in order to win. It looks like we did a little better than expected."

Greene, who paired with tailback Vince Johnson (3 TD's) to run up a 41-19 win over UMass last year in Boston, was sacked five times for a loss of 46 yards, and threw two interceptions, one of which was returned 85-yards for a touchdown by UMass cornerback Don Caparotti on the most exciting play of the game. Caparotti hid behind receiver Jason Andrade along the left sideline and stepped up to intercept Greene's pass, then raced untouched the length of the field to put UMass up 47-16 in the fourth quarter.

Tied at 10-10 after the first quarter, UMass scored on five of its next six possessions to open up a 41-16 lead. David Mitchell capped a 92 yard drive early in the second quarter with a 2-yard touchdown run, Marco Gabrielli kicked a 37-yard field goal on the last play of the first half, Wilkos scrambled eight yards for a touchdown on the first drive of the third quarter, and Johnson scooted around the left end of the offensive line on a 6-yard touchdown run to give UMass a 34-10 lead less than five minutes into the third quarter.

Johnson's touchdown was the first his collegiate career; he added a second on a 2-yard plunge later in the third quarter.

BU entered averaging 324.5 yards passing and 410 total yards a game on offense. The Minutemen shut down fullback Jay Hillman (15 rushes, 29 yards and one touchdown), however, leaving Greene to

Field hockey falls victim to ODU

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

BROOKLINE — It was the kind of game over you throw away the tapes. It was the kind of game that the UMass field hockey team hopes to never play again. It was a rout.

Saturday afternoon at Parsons Field, Old Dominion dealt UMass its second loss of the season, with a resounding 4-0, thumping of the Minutewomen.

Old Dominion was as good a team as UMass will face all season. It is the second ranked team in the nation, and Saturday they showed why. 13 minutes into the game, Old Dominion scored a typical turf goal. UMass goalie Philippa Scott saved the first shot, but the ball bounced high on the turf right onto the stick of Old Dominion forward Lynn Hoinsky, who slipped the ball into the open net to give ODU a 1-0 lead.

UMass had two chances to score in the first half, both on pretty rushes by Mara Frattasio. But both times ODU goalie Kathy Fosina was there to deny the Minutewomen.

ODU wasted no time dismissing any UMass thoughts of an upset when Robin Smith scored the first of her two goals on a penalty stroke. Smith added her second goal on another penalty shot, to up the ODU lead to 3-0.

Why the second penalty shot was awarded to ODU is still a mystery. "No one knows why the second stroke was awarded," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. Never the less, Smith snuck her second goal of the game by Scott. Smith's first goal went just over Scott's glove, and her second went just under Scott's body.

Winnifred Sanders scored the fourth ODU goal on a penalty corner to give ODU a convincing 4-0 win. ODU outshot UMass 17-8. They had 15 penalty corners to UMass' five.

It is scary to think about how good number-one ranked North Carolina is if ODU is the second-ranked team.

"I think UMass is a good team," said Old Dominion coach Beth Anders. "North Carolina is good too. I really believe that any time anybody in the top 20 or 15 can beat anybody else. I think UMass will only get better. I wouldn't be surprised if we see them again in the tournament."

"We were undisciplined in our approach to the game," Hixon said. "I think we had more scoring opportunities in this game than we ever had in a game against Old Dominion."

The best way to look at this game for UMass is that it is only one loss, and it is not going to affect them in the rankings. As Hixon said before the game, this is a game that UMass is not supposed to win.

"We did not do the things that we wanted to do," Hixon said. "I don't think there are any shattered egos, for us it's just a matter of continuing to work. We can't rely on the one win against Providence to carry us."

"When you're defeated as soundly as this, it just makes you stop and think. It brings the humility factor back into it which is sometimes not that bad," Hixon said.

Men's soccer finishes third

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

They wanted to win their own tournament. For now, third place and the end of a five-game losing streak will do.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team went 0-1-1 in the Massachusetts Challenge Cup this past weekend. They tied Rider 2-2 on Sunday, after losing to Drexel 2-1 on Saturday.

The tournament title went to Maine, as the Black Bears beat Rider 1-0 on Saturday and defeated second place Drexel 2-1 on Sunday. The Black Bears' Gary Crompton was named tournament M.V.P.

UMass started out flat against Drexel on Saturday, and paid for it right away. At 14:16, Mike Petrarkis sent a centering pass to Jorge Garcia from the side, directly in front of the UMass defense. Garcia dribbled in and sent a blistering shot into the top of the net, giving the Dragons a 1-0 lead.

Drexel wasted no time regaining the lead, however. At 86:04, Andy Barat took a Brian Bradby corner kick and headed it into the left corner. UMass scrambled to re-tie the game, but Drexel kept up the pressure, forcing Minutemen keeper Jon Gruber to make two incredible saves from close range.

"We were not good with the ball today," said coach Jeff Gettler.

The trend continued Sunday against Rider. The Broncs spent almost the first 15 minutes in the UMass end, while the Minutemen could not mount much of an attack at all. However, midway through the half UMass got what looked like two huge breaks.

The first was a goal by Brett Anthony at 23:20, assisted by Randy Jacobs. Jacobs took the ball around midfield, headed up the sideline, then sent a centering pass to Anthony. Anthony broke cross-field and sent a low shot into the right corner.

Three minutes later, Rider midfielder Richard Thompson was thrown out of the game, giving UMass a man advantage for the remaining 70 minutes. But the Minutemen failed to take advantage, lacking intensity for long stretches of the second half.

"We were terrible," said a disappointed Gettler. "We played stupidly, without brains. We had no composure. Frankly, we deserved what we got today."

Rider had no difficulty cashing in, however. At 78:50, Mike Hoff took a cross from Mike Stasiulaitis and found the left corner of the net to tie the game.

UMass re-took the lead a minute later, when Anthony's second goal from a McEvoy assist gave the Minutemen a 2-1 lead.

But at 87:46, Hoff and Stasiulaitis teamed up again to knot the match at 2-2. Hoff took Stasiulaitis' cross in front of the net and scooted a shot by Armenti.

Volleyball drops two to A-10 rivals

West Virginia and Duquesne dispose of Minutewomen

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

Heading into the weekend, the UMass women's volleyball team knew it would have to win at least one of its two matches against division rivals West Virginia and Duquesne.

Because the teams face each other once a season and there are not many inter-conference matches, a team cannot afford to have a bad game for fear of dropping in the standings.

Despite this, the Minutewomen dropped both of their matches over the weekend.

Their first match was on Friday against an excellent West Virginia squad.

Although UMass lost the match in three straight games, coach Carol Ford said her team "could not have played better"in what she labeled an "amazing match".

The Minutewomen lost both of the first two games by the tight score of 11-15 before losing 2-15 in the third game.

While beating West Virginia would have been a plus, the Duquesne match was a "must win" for UMass, Ford said.

After UMass rolled out to an early 2-0 lead, winning 15-7 and 15-10, it seemed as though the Minutewomen might pick up their first conference victory.

It was not to be, however, as the Dukes rolled off three straight wins, 15-5, 15-9, and 15-8.

"I am not a happy person," Ford said after the match.

She said the team was assertive and "felt really good" after winning the first two games.

But in the third game, Duquesne played more tentative volleyball and UMass began getting burned on defense.

One major error Ford pointed out was attempting to change the lineup in the third game. First, setter Angie Paolucci, who has not seen much playing time because of a virus, came in, and then middle hitter Juanita Madrinan subbed.

"We're still young," said Ford, whose team could not handle the new line-up thrown at it.

Reds split

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team beat St. Mary's of California 2-1 in overtime Sunday. Kim Eynard scored the winning goal on an assist from Sue Gaudette.

The Reds were shutout by the University of Virginia on Saturday, 2-0.

Duffey curtails spending

State cuts cause immediate budget freeze

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

President-Chancellor Duffey yesterday issued an immediate spending curtailment order to all deans, directors and department heads in response to the "cumulative effect of prior budget cuts and the governor's most recent reduction of $310 million."

The decree freezes all spending except payroll and emergency purchases approved by one of the five vice-chancellors.

Kay Scanlon, spokesperson for the University Press Office, said the measure was instituted to give administrators some "breathing space" in financial matters.

She said the curtailment will allow officials to carefully dispense limited state-appropriated funds.

Duffey said in the memorandum the action is effective immediately and "shall remain in effect until the extent of this latest financial setback is determined and appropriate budget adjustments have been made to campus accounts to reflect the financial plan to cope with these reductions."

The curtailment will affect the following accounts: state operating funds, administration allowance, administrative overhead, alumni, centrally-allocated research trust funds, trust fund interest, tuition retention, and curriculum fee.

Only emergency purchases, approved by the appropriate vice-chancellor will be processed, according to the memorandum.

The state higher education system has suffered three spending cuts since the summer — two last month. The first cut was instituted by the legislature in response to declining revenues. Gov. Dukakis then ordered another spending cut Sept. 4, again citing declining revenues.

Dukakis ordered a third cut last week of $310 million, most of which will be felt by state health services and welfare, although the state scholarships will also be sliced. As part of this round of cuts, an additional 4 percent was removed from the state higher education system.

Scanlon said the order will not affect any revenue-based trust funds, for example, residence hall and dining common expenditures. Also exempt are certain contractual obligations such as buildings under construction, and various grants and other contracts.

The University's operating budget has been hit by three 4 percent cuts since the beginning of the fiscal year on July 1, for a total of $16 million or about 11 percent, according to Press Office figures.

The Press Office also released that the University's budget has declined 21.3 percent since 1988. The current state appropriated budget is $131.6 million; the 1988 budget was $167 million.

UMass students protest position cuts to EWC

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

In response to three positions being cut from the Everywoman's Center at the University of Massachusetts, 45 students wearing black clothing marched from the Cape Cod Lounge yesterday to Wilder Hall. They lined the walkway to await the appearance of Dennis Madson, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs.

Natasha Diephius, president of the Student Government Association, and Sara Lyons, executive officer of the Graduate Student Senate, with the help of others, sent a letter inviting Madson to take a tour of the EWC.

"It is important to have Madson view the services he is cutting and to see people outside angry that the EWC has been cut," Lyons said. Women and men held signs that said: "Madson you cannot make us disappear," "What happened to the Health, Safety, and well-being of students?", and "Incest doesn't stop just because the money does."

Bush denounces 'Iraqi aggression'

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — President Bush today denounced Iraqi President Saddam Hussein as an international outcast who plundered Kuwait. But Bush also offered Baghdad hope that relinquishing its grip on its Persian Gulf neighbor could spur negotiations on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The president's speech to the U.N. General Assembly blended condemnation of Saddam with an overture for a resolution of the two-month crisis. "We seek a peaceful outcome, a diplomatic outcome," Bush said in his prepared remarks.

Significantly, he offered the Iraqi leader the prospect of "new arrangements" among the states in the Gulf region as well as a chance for a settlement between the Arabs and Israel — provided Iraq departs from Kuwait unconditionally.

"Iraq's unprovoked aggression is a throwback to another era, a dark relic from a dark time," Bush said. "It has plundered Kuwait, terrorized innocent civilians and held even diplomats hostage."

The president, lining up with a proposal first advanced last week by Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, said Iraq and its leadership must be held liable "for these crimes of abuse and destruction."

But, at the same time, Bush edged perceptibly closer to Saddam's demand that his territorial dispute with Kuwait be linked to the Arabs' grievance with Israel for holding on to territory Syria and Jordan lost in the 1967 Mideast war.

A similar gesture last week by President Francois Mitterrand of France drew a mixed response Sunday from Saddam, who suggested that Iraq would fight to defend its seizure of Kuwait but also offered to open a "debate" with France on the region's future.

"We intend to make contacts with the French government to explain after inquiry, questioning and dialogue our views accurately so that everything is based on clear

Mohawks secede in Oka after 78 days

By RIC OLIVEIRA
Collegian Staff

Editors note — This is part five of a multi-part series on the situation of the Mohawk Nation in Quebec, Canada. The writer is a Collegian staff member who is currently in Kahnawake, Quebec.

Mohawks in Oka who had been in a 78-day holdout barricaded behind barbed wire, and surrounded by 1,000 Canadian Army troops, agreed last Wednesday to come out in a "secession of hostilities." Mohawks in Kauhnawake forced the Army to retreat several 100 feet in two encampents on the reserve of Kahnawake. Mohawks were angered by the recent apparent brutality tactics used in Oka in which unarmed Mohawk men, women, and children were thrown to the ground as they left the barricades, and held down by soldiers' feet on their heads, until moved to buses by soldiers with bayonets.

Shortly after these graphic scenes were played on television, several 100 Mohawks attacked two army installations, and burned tents and supplies. During the encounter, the army sprayed tear gas upon the mostly unarmed Mohawks, seriously injuring one man and sending two more to the hospital.

The Mohawks who were armed had either hockey sticks, shields or tear gas, to respond to the soldiers heavily armed with machine guns, armored patrol carriers, and rifles. Mohawks called for the immediate removal of all army personnel who had been on the reserve since the Oka crisis had ended.

Colleges recruit Black men

BOSTON (AP) — Colleges and universities are stepping up their efforts to recruit Black students, responding to recent trends that indicate fewer Black men are showing interest in higher education.

"We're talking about a population that is really getting out of the mainstream of American life," said Leon Braswell, assistant director of admissions at Bowdoin College and past president of the New England Consortium of Black Admissions Counselors.

"If we continue spending more money putting Black men in jail than educating them, we are going to end up with a society that is hell."

The number of Black men attending college declined from 464,000 nationwide in 1980 to 443,000 last year.

In the same period, the number of Black women attending college increased from 643,000 to 687,000, according to the Almanac of the Chronicle of Higher Education.

Officials at Harvard, where a 60-40 ratio of Black women to Black men has been typical in recent years, found two years ago that among the 138 Black students in the 1,600-member class, there were nearly twice as many women as men: 90 women to 48 men.

"We are in the midst of a crisis — the vanishing Black male," said David L. Evans, a senior admissions officer for Harvard University.

Next month, the annual meeting of the National Association of College Admissions Counselors will, for the first time, devote an entire session to the issue of recruiting Black men.

"The Madison Avenue image now of the African-American male is one of being anti-intellectual, anti-school and even dangerous," Evans said. "A Black 10-year-old watching TV is not likely to see a Black engineer. More likely, he will see a Black man running up and down a hardwood floor or being led off in handcuffs."

Judges will be watched

BOSTON (AP) — The chief justice of the Boston Municipal Court said he will begin keeping records of judges' hours and require them to check in with him any day they want to leave early.

"Each one of the judges realizes that they are expected to be here, and they will be here," Chief Justice William J. Tierney. "I talked to each one of them individually and they accepted what I had to say," he said.

In a five-part Spotlight series, the Boston Globe last week reported that six of the municipal court's 11 judges regularly quit work by mid-afternoon at a time when there is a large backlog of cases.

Tierney, in an interview with the Globe at Suffolk County Courthouse on Friday, also said the court's judges were unfairly depicted when the Spotlight team wrote that they provided a "fast-paced, sentence-reduction bonanza for defendants."

ideas and actions," the Iraqi leader said in a broadcast message on the birthday of the Muslim prophet Mohammed.

Mitterrand, in a four-step proposal, called first for Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait, which it invaded on Aug. 2. The pullout would be supervised by international observers as the emirate's sovereignty was restored.

Then, negotiators would deal with the division of Lebanon and the Arab-Israeli conflict. In the fourth stage, armaments in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf would be scaled down.

WMUA tables sexual harassment policy

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY
Collegian Staff

Members of WMUA voted yesterday to table the station's proposal for sexual harassment policy because it did not contain clear provisions for enforcement or due process for people who can be accused of its violation.

The proposal, formulated in the 1990 spring semester by WMUA Training Committee, serves as an extension of the current University of Massachusetts Code of Conduct Policy, said WMUA Programmer Christia Rosetti.

In the proposal, sexual harassment is defined as a situation in which acceptance or rejection of sexual advances interferes with work or grades.

If it passes, the proposal would permit suspension of members guilty of sexual harassment as determined by a WMUA Executive Committee.

Vague language in the proposal concerning who would determine if the sexual harrassment code is violated raised objections among several WMUA members who said that the policy would leave "open the possibility of abuse in the future."

"This is very hazy," said Will Pile, WMUA Program Director. "Beware that this open doors for abuse. It doesn't say who determines if it is harassment.

"A law against sexual harassment is adopted by the University," Pile added. "Let them deal with it at their level, not leave us toying with this policy."

Program Director Will Pile speaks against the proposed sexual harassment policy at last night's WMUA meeting.

Several members have expressed concern that the code against sexual harassment can be extended to song lyrics which could be labeled as objectionable.

"The policy should be clear to distinguish between harassment in the workplace and what can be construed as harassment on the air," said Eric Walgren, WMUA trainee.

Several people spoke out in support of the adaptation of the proposal as it has already been written.

"I think that there should be faith in the fact that the Executive Committee will be fair," Rosetti said. "There should be ramification on the station level other than the University level. This shows that we can do something about it."

"Resources for women are so small," said WMUA member Shira Katz. "Everything that I learned says that harassment is determined by the victim. As a potential victim, I would like to have a process to do it."

"I think that they should just pass it," said Disk Jockey Alisa Berkowitz. "This is just absolutely ridiculous. I can't believe that they keep on tabling it."

WMUA member Heather Smiths said, "This is just a matter of working bugs out of the language. At the end we'll get what we need."

Budget cuts threaten jobs

Untenured faculty fear their uncertain future

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Untenured faculty met yesterday to discuss the future of their positions in the wake of continued budget cuts at the University of Massachusetts.

At a closed meeting yesterday afternoon in the Campus Center, untenured faculty expressed concern for their jobs at the University.

John Cole, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors said, "There was a very deep depression and low moral in the meeting."

In addition to the impact of the cuts, the meeting also dealt with the commitment of state government to higher education, commitment of UMass administrators to untenured faculty, and their policy toward untenured faculty.

Cole said a number of options were discussed to defer potential layoffs including furloughs, sabbaticals and pay cuts, but no plan of action was taken.

The University has lost more than 285 staff members and about 65 faculty members as a result of attrition, a hiring freeze, and non-renewal of contracts. Over the summer, a hiring freeze was also placed on teaching assistants.

Professors at the University have also been working without a contract for the past year. Last month, five UMass professors accepted an early retirement offer by the University to offset costs.

SGA Senate election to be conducted today

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association elections for the student senate are scheduled from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. today at the University of Massachusetts.

Most elected senate seats, 89 out of a 97 total, will be up for bid. Representatives of the Third World Caucus, who are selected by the caucus and not elected, will be confirmed by the senate tommorrow night.

Alan VanTassel, chairman of the Student Government Affairs Committee, said only about 25 percent of the undergraduate student body vote in SGA senate elections.

He said students should vote since the senate approves financial allocations, which are drafted by the Budget Committee, to Registered Student Organizations on campus. The committee administers a budget of $2.1 million, which is funded by a $120 mandatory student fee each semester.

Because of enrollment decline, commuters have lost 12 seats in the senate, which is 25 percent of their representation. The commuter population has decreased by 2,000 students since last year.

The tightest race will be for Dickenson dormitory senator as five candidates have petitioned to run for one representative seat.

Pierpont and Brett dormitory each have four candidates contesting for one senatorial seat.

The designated voting locations are determined by the following places of residence: commuters must vote in the Hatch; Greeks who live in Greek housing must vote in the Newman Center; Orchard Hill and Central Residents must vote on the dormitory side of Franklin Dining Commons; Northeast and Sylvan residents must vote on the Barracks side of Worcester Dining Commons; Southwest South residents must vote in Berkshire Dining Commons; and Southwest North residents must vote in Hampshire Dining Commons.

Two UMass assaults investigated by police

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University Police are investigating two assault and batteries committed near the Campus Pond on Friday night only minutes apart. Police, however, believe the incidents are not related in any way.

A Southwest student told police that he was struck in the head with a solid object while walking near the Student Union and the Tower Library.

Police said the student was taken to University Health Services.

At 11:34 p.m., five minutes after the first incident was reported to police, a 20-year-old male student told police that he was attacked by a group of 10-12 persons.

The man told police that he was walking toward the Campus Center when a man in the group of about 10 men and two women shouted homophobic slurs to him.

After the verbal altercation, the man punched the student, knocking his glasses off. The student also said that the man kicked him several times.

The student was taken to UHS for treatment of a broken jawbone before assisting police in a search for the attackers.

Because of the nature of the incident, the Community Disorders Unit of the University Police are investigating.

In a separate incident, a student reported to police that he was assaulted with a dangerous weapon by two persons outside of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall on Saturday. The student was treated and released at UHS.

ARRESTS

- Police arrested Robert G. Nagle, 28, of Dedham, and James F. Lambert, 27, of Boston, for trespassing at John Quincy Adams on Saturday.
- Jeremy T. Kelly, 18, of Marblehead, was arrested at John Adams early Saturday morning for trespassing.
- Shawn G. Redmond, 20, of Peabody, was arrested early Saturday morning by Bridgewater Police on a warrant for malicious destruction of property worth more than $1,000.

LARCENY

- A man in John Quincy Adams reported to police Saturday the theft of $40 and several credit cards from his wallet. The man had left the room unlocked and was not in the room, police said.

SUSPICIOUS ACTIVITY

- A dispute over a loud stereo in Kennedy resulted in a male student smashing a room door with a pick ax on Friday night. Police said a show cause hearing will be sought in Northampton District Court.

No excuse for sexual harassment

Over the last two weeks, a storm has been brewing in professional sports — should or shouldn't women be allowed to go into men's locker rooms to pursue an elusive player for an interview, or to simply shoot the breeze with some players while others prance around in various stages of undress? Sports writers and columnists have been bantering about whether any reporter, male or female, should be in the locker room at all.

Meredith O'Brien

This issue of women in the locker rooms, of course, has suddenly become talk-show fodder due to the recent incident involving a Boston Herald reporter being allegedly sexually harassed in the New England Patriot's locker room on Sept. 17.

Apparently, the reporter, Lisa Olson, was interviewing Patriot's defensive back Maurice Hurst, whose locker happens to be right next to the showers. During the interview, tight end Zeke Mowatt and several other players came out of the shower naked. Mowatt reportedly stood up on a scale to weigh in when he turned to Olson and said, "You're not writing, you're just looking."

Then, various reports allege several players walked by taunting Olson, asking her if she wanted to touch certain parts of their bodies, some supposedly grabbing themselves in front of her.

In the aftermath of this ugly scene, the Patriot's owner, Victor Kiam casually dismissed the incident as but a "brief flyspeck in the ocean," further commenting that women do not belong in the locker room anyway.

Kiam was extensively quoted by several publications and reporters as having called Olson a "classic bitch" — a quote he so vehemently denies that he took out full-page ads in the Boston Globe, New York Times and the Boston Herald to deny the statement attributed to him.

When the negative publicity hit the national airwaves and newspapers, Kiam couldn't take the heat and rushed to redeem himself through a much-delayed apology to Olson and spreading a $2,000 fine for Mowatt over the span of 14 weeks, a mere fraction of his $460,000 salary.

With the National Football League probing the incident, Kiam unsuccessfully tried to push the onus on Patriot's General Manager Patrick Sullivan by attempting to suspend him until the probe had ended. The NFL quashed Kiam's attempts to suspend Sullivan, while Sullivan has been running around proclaiming he will continue to run the team until he is told otherwise.

What is wrong with this picture?

A reporter doing her job was indecently and unprofessionally accosted by other so-called professionals simply because she happens to be female, and yet most of the uproar is about Kiam's apology, about the Sullivan incident, about whether Olson should have even been in the locker room in the first place.

Brushing aside the locker room incident, which was settled several years ago by a court decision decreeing women will and do have a right to be in the locker rooms alongside their male colleagues, we have raw sexual harassment.

In the tradition of the history of women, I suppose Olson simply should have known better. She probably should have realized that whenever a woman attempts to break down the barriers of a "men-only fortress" she will suffer abuse and castigation. She probably didn't realize that women are supposed to just take this abuse as par-for-the-course.

As one reporter who has already paid her dues and received her share of sexually intimidating and harassing comments from other so-called professionals she was covering, I think it is high time women stop bearing the guilt for their own harassment and that people stop making excuses to justify their harasser.

The people making these comments should be punished, not simply slapped on the wrist. Harassment should never be tolerated. Women should never be silent about their abuse. Women should not have to prove their innocence.

Lisa Olson had a legal right to be in that locker room. She is a professional. No matter what she might have said or where she might have looked, she does not have to make excuses for her presence there or for the bullish and intimidating tauntings of her subjects.

Would the mere suspension of a player for a game or two be too harsh a price to pay for harassment?

We don't want to hear any more excuses.

Voter registration a must

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts is in a state of utter chaos. The primary election has shown that the voters of the state are angry — and rightly so. Leadership has disintegrated during the Dukakis administration. People want a change from "politics as usual."

Lost in this whirlwind of state hardships and budget cuts is the necessity for state higher education.

Students must take the initiative — by registering to vote.

UMass students who are unregistered must register and vote in the state, either here in Amherst or at home.

The benefit of registering in Amherst is twofold: one, it will be easier for students to go to the polls on election day, and two, students will have a strong, collective voice. This voice will reflect, throughout the state, our power and unity.

Those registered in their hometowns must write to their town clerks for an absentee ballot.

Out-of-state students can and should register in Amherst — the events in the Statehouse affect them greatly for four years. This way, out-of-state students have their own voice, and can help control skyrocketing tuition and fees.

There will be voter registration drives in the Cape Cod Lounge today and Wednesday, October 2 and 3, between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m.

We, as students of the state college and university system, must be heard. It is not a privilege to be heard, it is a right. Please register to vote in Massachusetts, and remember to ensure the future of state higher education by voting on Nov. 6. Deadline for registration is Oct. 9.

Allow me my own identity, please

Kudos to Minu Sebastian on her most recent, ah, contribution ("What is a token minority," Sept. 27).

For years, I've deluded myself into thinking that I might have actually succeeded in carving out an identity for myself in this race-torn world.

With Ms. Sebastian's enlightened assistance, I've learned otherwise. Many thanks.

Indeed, I now marvel at the profoundness of my naivete and idealism when I foolishly believed that people of varying ethnicities and cultural perspectives should, as a moral imperative, try to coexist.

It is folly far too evident for exposition for one to think that we should recognize people as human beings, first and foremost, or that the whole of a society might be greater than the sum of its constituent cultures.

Ms. Sebastian asserts that all people are not the same. In this I fully concur. And I would submit that her self-serving, ill-reasoned article corroborates this fact far more eloquently than a "token minority" such as myself possibly could.

For Ms. Sebastian, apparently, one's degree of political rectitude is the only measure of one's ability to make a contribution to the debate involving the critical issues of the day.

I, as a Black man (note the absence of the trendy "African-American." I despise the concept of identity-by-prefix.), do a disservice to the Third World community not because "I halt any critical thought in the majority community on issues concerning culture, history and identity."

Rather, my treachery arises out of my unwillingness to tow the philosophical line which Ms. Sebastian and her ideological clones worship to the exclusion of any real critical thought.

The very idea that intelligent and concerned people, much less intelligent and concerned Black people, might actually disagree with Ms. Sebastian seems never to have entered her mind.

Such is an unfortunate, albeit common, side effect of tunnel vision.

Ironically, Ms. Sebastian's contempt for dissent plagues even her definition of the term "token minority." She defines one, in part, as "a person who is not representative of the whole." Splendid.

This is a good working definition which suffices to describe most "insignificant" contributors to philosophy, and Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. most readily come to mind.

In sum, I am left wondering whether Ms. Sebastian would actually prefer a society in which birth or ethnicity is the sole determinant of how one should lead one's life.

If so, I would commend her attention to some of that cultural history she is so fond of, for she is certain to find many examples of such systems.

They are called castes.

Virtues of academia

There is something dreadfully wrong with the way education is perceived in this country and at this University.

"Smart doesn't mean good, " says Spenser, the private detective created by Robert B. Parker, and many applaud, because as we all know, people who pursue knowledge for its own sake tend to be weak, celibate, psychotic or all of the above.

Thomas DeFreitas

It is perfectly all right for someone to boast of athletic accomplishments; it is less well-mannered (but much more frequent) to boast of one's sexual exploits, but show any sign of pride over a Dean's Listing, a good SAT score or a 100 on that killer logic test and you immediately bear a stigma.

God forbid you should use expressions like "in which" or "thereabouts," lest the people you're talking to erupt into laughter. A longtime friend of mine once criticized me for saying we were "en route" to Harvard Square. "Why don't you just say we're on the way there, or something like that?" Answer: because "en route" was the first expression that came to mind, because virtually every third-grader can guess what "en route" means and because that's the way I talk.

I have heard a lot of discussion about the bias of public education in the U.S.; it is Anglophilic, it favors Whites, it is too steeped in "Western thought" (whatever that is).

Although I'd be the first to admit (after Dr. Silber) that American high schools are far from perfect, I would also say that "when in Rome, do as the Romans do." As everyone from William F. Buckley to Sidney Poitier can tell you, you can't get far in this country without speaking something recognizably akin to Standard American English. There is no need to "enshrine" English as an official language for all intents and purposes, it already is. And needless to say (I hope), diplomas and degrees are not given out on the basis of knowing how to change a tire; a degree of aptitude in math and science would help.

New books and facilities are urgently needed if everyone is to have an equal chance at success; disrepair is pandemic. The Secretary of Education should actively encourage the legislative and executive branches of the federal government to cut the defense budget and put some money towards rectifying the abysmal situation that many schools find themselves in. Compassionate and enthusiastic teachers are needed just as urgently; even at some of the so-called "better" schools, there are glaring examples of incompetence, apathy and insensitivity amongst the faculty.

At this University, there are a couple of policies which trouble me. My mentioning them may be seen as "nitpicking," or as symptomatic of "educational Darwinism." But here goes. One needs only a 2.2 cumulative grade-point average to become a Residential Assistant, while a 2.8 (I believe) is the minimum for those who would study overseas. One of the many obligations of an RA is to provide an atmosphere in which there are no hindrances to education; someone with a GPA two-tenths of a point above academic probation level is not, in my view, a fitting candidate for the job. The restrictive requirement on international exchange discourages the best chance a student has to learn about another culture; apparently, the rhetoric about "diversity" is exactly that: just rhetoric.

Also, especially for first-year students, the assignation of roommates should be on the basis of similar scores on the Scholastic Aptitude Test (no more than 100 points' difference). Not only do I believe that such tests constitute an apt reflection of one's ability, but they also refect attitude; someone who values education should not be forced to live with a total stranger who lives for the next keg party. Such mismatches would be avoided if the transcripts were looked at beforehand.

The EWC has lost three coordinators this semester. This is a total of six out of nine positions in three years.

The coordinator of the Bridge Program, which provides support for and education about women who are multiply oppressed, left the position last spring for another University position. The position was then frozen.

Due to budget cuts this fall, the coordinator of the Counseling Program, the only women-centered counseling on campus, was transferred to Mental Health Services.

The coordinator of the Public Relations and Outreach Program, which provides all of the advertising to the community about the EWC, was transferred to Financial Aid.

An organizer of the protest, Maggie Magner said, "You can't provide a safe unique place for women and go to Mental Health Services — they are mutually exclusive.

"Mainstreaming women's issues invalidates women's experiences," Magner said.

Larissa Diephius, another organizer of the protest said, "The EWC can deal with sensitive issues that MHS can't deal with."

One organizer of the protest, Rua Kelly, said that people wore black to symbolize the death of programs and the bleak future.

When Madson walked out of the EWC protesters began to chant, "No more silence, no more violence." The protesters followed Madson as he walked to his car.

He turned around and said, "I agree."

Protesters walked to the Whitmore Aministration Building where they stood outside chanting "Ho, ho, hey, hey, EWC has got to stay."

Then they walked up to the Vice Chancellor's Office where they left messages for Madson. Magner wrote, "These transfers from EWC are completely unacceptable to us. Change it."

Kelly said women are angry and feel that if their emotional and physical needs are not met then the administration is basically saying they do not care about women.

"Any problems we may have as a result of society, such as eating disorders, they're saying they are not important enough to recognize," Kelly said.

Kelly said the addition of three positions to Madson's office says that his photocopying and bureaucracy are more important than women's stability.

Madson said that no new positions have been added to his office. "With the break-up of the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office, three people report to one of my assistants — but that always happened."

"If anything we have cut Student Affairs drastically."

Madson said he is a trained counselor and he understands how important counseling at the EWC is for women.

"We need multiple resources and counseling centers," Madson said. "We all should be proud of the EWC. It has a national reputation."

Madson said he could not assure that the Everywoman's Center would be around in the future if the University sustains more cuts. He said the University will suffer more drastic cuts if the Citizens for Limited Taxation referendum passes in the Nov. election.

Gina Gombar, an organizer of the protest said, "It is important to understand that the 4 percent cut to Student Affairs has been disproportionately and consistently affecting the EWC.

"We are not even sure if the women transferred to MHS will even be a women's counselor," Gombar said.

Swati Joshi, a protester, said the only counseling left at the EWC is rape counseling.

"This sends a message that I am not important unless I have been raped," she said.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

A theme on which to begin discourse

As was introduced and discussed in a recent editorial on this page, there has been a position created to represent women of color and Third World women's issues.

As Co-Women's issues editors Amy and I consider these issues significant and necessary to address. Through this page we hope to create discourse which will be of value to all.

A theme (which can be subject to question) on which to base discourse could be to address whether there is a common ground on which all women are connected. For example, because all women are oppressed not only by men but by the institutions that men primarily run, is this enough to link all women? Because there are clear and diverse opinions on this issue, we feel that it could be a starting point for discussion.

Sebastian/Henry

As a woman of color some immediate questions come to mind in order to begin a discussion.

Given the current economic and political structure, is it possible for "diversity" to be an issue or a priority? This assumes that in order for the current "women's movement" to include women of color and Third World women, the values implicit in the movement must be addressed. What are these values and if the values were to change, what are the alternatives? And are women who are currently involved in "women's issues" willing to change their values and lifestyles?

In order for the "women's movement" to be comprehensive, the agenda needs to be altered to work with nationalist movements within the Third World. This may mean putting "women's issues" aside in order to first to examine global issues such as who will control the world's resources and who will consume them.

I recognize that in order to address these questions, there must be fundamental changes in the way we define and perceive ourselves in context with the rest of the world. It means a return to basic questions such as what does it mean to be a woman? Are we going to assimilate into the current institutional structures around us or are we going to rise above them to effect change?

As a White woman, I am just beginning to see how entrenched I am in a Eurocentric society. I am learning how to try to get rid of these values so I can take off the pro-American glasses and see the lies and propaganda our government brainwashes the American people and other countries about how great America is.

I am learning the extent of the damage that the United States has done through its Eurocentric foreign policy which tries to spread American values and policies in a completely self-satisfying way which destroys Third World economies by having them become less self-sufficient by providing First World countries with their resources and goods.

Given that we live in a society that does this where does this leave women of color who have grown up in the U.S., Third World women, lesbian, bisexual, disabled, poor, and white women when we are all trying to understand each other? That is, how can we relate farther than that we are all oppressed by men? Some women do not even believe that first assumption. I think we must first acknowledge that we all have very different needs and wants.

If we try to gloss over differences and try to become one big movement everyone will become rightly offended because women need to be communicated with in accordance to their background, history, religious, and sexual preferences, etc. I think the best thing that different types of women can do when communicating with each other is to listen and be open to each other's perspective.

Education is also an important part of understanding another woman's perspective. White women need to not only understand there own history but also the history of women of color in the U.S. and Third World women. This is a hefty load of reading.

I think that separatist, nationalist, and collective movements are important for women to get together. Separatist movements are necessary so that women within their own communities can network. I also think women need to come out of their communities and work with other women to understand each other's issues and to try to work together on collective issues.

What are the collective issues? Abortion and the Violence Against Women Movement are the only two movements that come to mind in which I see different types of women working together. Even these movements are primarily White.

Any written reactions to these questions we are raising should be typed, double-spaced, and dropped off in the 'women's editor' box at 115 Campus Center.

Orchard Hill Women's Center opens

By SARA JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

The Orchard Hill/Central Area Women's Center is a place woman can go to find support and friendship. Located in room 115 of the Van Meter House in the Central Area, The Woman's Center offers a variety of programs to assure women that there is a safe and friendly place that they can go to on campus.

The Women's Center is a collective group run by students. Most of the women involved work a three hour shift at the center.

This semester various workshops will be held by the center on issues such as religion, education, and nutrition. The women are also involved in planning dynamic guest speakers.

Weekly movies will be run in various places on campus. A wide range of movies have been suggested by members of the group such as "The Yellow Wallpaper," "The Accused," and "Tootsie."

The first movie is scheduled for 3:00 p.m. on Sunday October 14 in Gorman House. Following the movie will be an optional discussion for anyone interested in sharing their ideas.

Weekly meetings are held on Sundays at 7:00 p.m. at the center. Each week a different woman will facilitate the meeting.

The meetings give women a chance to get together and discuss issues that effect their lives. All women are welcome to attend.

The center houses a lending library containing various feminist literature and philosophy. A resource file listing services available to women on campus is also available at the center.

The center is open from 3 p.m. until 9 p.m. Sunday through Friday. All women are welcome to use the facility during these hours.

Earlier this month, the U.S. Attorney General asked the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in the U.S. Within the next few years, "Roe" may be overturned, returning women to the days of back-alley abortions.

Pro-choice activists have been fearing the overturn of "Roe" ever since the July, 1989 Webster decision, which invited states to place severe restrictions on the right of a woman to choose abortion. Since that time, many states have enacted restrictive anti-choice legislation.

Although abortion remains legal in the U.S., large numbers of women do not have access to abortion services as a result of these restrictions. Women under the age of eighteen must notify or obtain permission from their parents in order to have an abortion in an increasing number of states.

Medicaid funding is only available for abortions in thirteen states. And since the "Hyde Amendment" was passed in 1977, the U.S. Congress has prohibited the use of federal funds remain available for sterilization on demand for any woman receiving Medicaid.

Since 1981, the prohibition on federal funds has extended even to low-income women who become pregnant as a result of rape or incest. In 1989, the U.S. Congress voted to restore funding, but President Bush vetoed the legislation.

In the coming weeks, the U.S. Congress will again debate whether to restore Medicaid funding for abortions for low-income women who are victims of rape and incest. Furthermore, we oppose any provisions that would impose prohibitive reporting requirements on women who are victims of rape or incest in order to be eligible for Medicaid funding.

For women students, the importance of safe, legal and accessible abortion is clear. A recent study conducted by researchers at John Hopkins University found that more African-American teenagers from low-income backrounds who had abortions graduated from high school or advanced their education than those who had children. Those who had abortions and those who had children were equally likely to be pleased with their decisions one year later.

It is up to us as women to decide when to have children. It is not a decision to be made by legislators. And, in order to make that choice a reall choice for low-income women (a number of whom are also students), Medicaid funding must be restored.

Dent/White

Women students are all so affected by the rising incidence of sexual violence in our society. Increasing numbers of women students are victims of sexual violence. One in five adult women will be raped at some point in their lives. One in four of the women now in college have been attacked by a rapist. More than half of college rape victims are attacked by dates. (Source: Koss, Woodruff, and Koss, "A Criminology Study, 1990.")

Rape remains the most under-reported of all major crimes. Women may avoid reporting a rape as a result of post-abortion trauma or fear of retaliation. This fear would also prevent women who were victims of incest, especially at a young age, from reporting the crime.

Finally, in a society where the victim is often blamed for the crime, women may be ashamed to admit that they have been raped. All of these factors apply to women reported in "Psychology of Women Quarterly," only 3.8 percent of college women who had been raped reported the incident to the police.

Some members of Congress are proposing attaching a 48-hour or 72-hour reporting requirement to the legislation restoring Medicaid funding for victims of rape and incest. Clearly, such a restrictive reporting requirement would all but nullify the impact of an expanded funding provision.

If and when a woman reports rape, she rarely does so before seeking support from others. Incest survivors are often threatened into silence, a silence which after many years can become a complete loss of memory. Reporting requirements ignore the realities of tape and incest.

Perhaps as important, however, is the fact that such restrictions call into question the credibility of all women, and imply that women will lie about rape over incest in order to obtain Medicaid funding.

It is our responsibility as students and as voters to make our views known to our members of Congress and to the President. Legislation restoring Medicaid funding for abortions for low-income women who are victims of rape and incest will be debated in Congress during the month of September. Make your voice heard!

Write to your representative and ask her/him to support the restoration of Medicaid funds for abortion services for victims of rape and incest in the Labor-Health and Human Services Appropriations Bill and to oppose any attempt to nullify the funding by imposing restrictive reporting requirements.

Venezuelan play depicts class exploitation

By ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

A worker, Orlando, wearing factory uniform, hardhat and name tag, is being treated by the company psychologist, a woman dressed in a blazer, eyeglasses and makeup. The stage is set in a factory inside the company psychologist's office.

At one point in the play Orlando screams, "I accept what I have but I'm not satisfied." The psychologist replies, "The world is like that, some have, and some don't . . . The rich also get ill and die." The interaction between the two characters depicts class struggle and worker exploitation under Western capitalism in Venezuela and the rest of Latin America.

In the backdrop, slides show scenes of Venezuelan slums, urban highrises, children, landscape, riots and revolutionary graffiti. The visuals add an emotionally subtle yet intellectually realistic documentary behind the fiction of theater.

Orlando is a middle-aged blue-collar worker, the psychologist a younger white-collar, both trapped by the imperialistic company and both unconscious of the roles they play for the company.

La Empresa Perdona Un Momento de Locura (The Company Pardons a Moment of Madness) was the season opener this past weekend for New WORLD Theater at the University of Massachusetts. The play, by Venezuelan playwright Rodolfo Santana, directed by UMass graduate and New WORLD Theater member Caty Laignel, was performed twice in Spanish and twice in English.

The psychologist coerces Orlando into revealing his grief over the death of his son, who was murdered by the police for his political views, covered up as a bank robbery. Orlando's son had protested imperialistic ownership of their country and told him that the company owner's boss was a Yankee they couldn't see, owners of everything.

He said that Orlando "was exploited, that they owe him," and he told him about infrastructure and surplus value. "Do you know what infrastructure is? Surplus value?" asked the psychologist. "No!" replied Orlando.

Orlando has been sent to the company psychologist because when a young boy cut his hand in a factory machine, Orlando grabbed a hammer and started beating the machines and yelling to his co-workers that they're "exploited by the fucking capitalist bourgeois, that the Yankees were responsible."

Because of this incident, production of the company had gone down. Workers are questioning the board of directors. Thus the company psychologist must manipulate Orlando by "clinical treatment, to return you to a model worker." She tells him that his son's political views were wrong and that he had just experienced a "paranoid hysterical reaction to the boy's hand."

"I don't know fucking surplus value," he says. The psychologist treats Orlando to eventually scream that he's happy with what he has by getting him to beat a dummy representing the company. And then she convinces him to publicly accept a medal of honor for 24 years of service to the company.

If only for a few moments, Orlando is conscious of his class under Western capitalist exploitation. The company psychologist never becomes aware of her similar disposition as she expresses her anger, with self-righteous confidence, at Orlando's views and beliefs against the company which they are both employed.

Francisco Cabrera, as Orlando, and Caty Laignel, as the psychologist both give powerful and commanding performances. La Empresa was another New WORLD Theater production of theater for social change which stimulates emotion, intellect and social awareness.

Vigilante justice, country living and some damn fine clues

By LEAH ARINIELLO
Collegian Correspondent

Is it vigilante justice or just plain country living that makes the people of Twin Peaks so nutty? Maybe it's the hospital food. But one thing is for certain, if you were confused before, the list of clues given during the season premiere of Twin Peaks Sunday night will have you wondering if you're not too young to have Altzheimer's.

Special agent Dale Cooper is not dead. Good thing, without him we would never have found out the clues, courtesy of a demented Boris Karloff look-a-like: 1) "A man in a smiling bag," 2)"The owls are not what they seem" and 3)"Without chemicals, he points."

▲TWIN PEAKS▲

Was Dale Cooper dreaming? Now, I bet you know who killed Laura. Right. We also got another clue: "Leo locked inside a hungry horse." Cooper, our good ole' detective, figured this one out. Leo was in jail in Hungry Horse, Montana in 1988 when Theresa Banks was murdered, which means he didn't kill Laura (the person who did, killed Theresa too). He also figures that the murderer's blood was on the note that said: "Fire walk with me," which was found at the murder scene. The blood type doesn't match with Jacques', Leo's, Ronette's or Laura's. Who is this mysterious murderer?

In Cooper's next dream, the mysterious giant tells him. "One person saw the third man. Three have seen him, but not the body. One is known to you and is ready to talk."

One plus, is that all the characters who were chopped, burned and shot on the last show are in comas or still alive. At least the cast isn't all dead, with the possible exception of Catherine, who might have died in the fire. Benjamin Horne is quite happy about this tragedy. Pretty strange, since they used to be lovers.

But what's not strange? Certainly not the one-armed man coming to the police station to sell shoes to Sheriff Truman or Laura's father running around singing "Mares eat oats and does eat oats and little lambs eat ivy."

At the end of the show, Ronette, who's in a coma, has a recollection of what happened the night Laura was killed. "Killer Bob," who appeared in Cooper's, Laura and her mother's dreams in previous episodes, screams, while Laura, blood oozing from her mouth, flashes across the screen. Creepy. For more baloney, magic tricks and psychological mumbo-jumbo, tune in next Saturday at 10 p.m.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Get together with influential people who can steer business your way. Make a special effort to settle your recent differences with mate or partner. A blow up should be avoided at all costs.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) A close friend points out your need to brush up on certain skills. Do not take offense. This person has your best interests at heart. Member of opposite sex's motives may be questioned.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Settle a financial matter early, so you will not be distracted during later business negotiations. It may be different to extricate yourself from a romantic entanglement. Be diplomatic!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Idealism is at the center of a business decision. Those who work behind the scenes could hold the trump card. Proceed at you own risk. Enjoy the arts, music and at-home entertainment.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Pace yourself to keep up with increased demands. Your instincts work in your favor. An attractive member of the opposite sex holds the key to greater financial or emotional security.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Showcase your creative talents to impress prominent people. You will be honored for the way you handle yourself in a crisis situation. Travel will give you a wonderful new perspective.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Your ambitions could shift dramatically giving you new freedom. Treat an authority figure as a friend, not a foe. Religion and philosophy suddenly become more important to you.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Those who work in offices will need all their powers of concentration today. A lunch date may have to be postponed. Steer clear of high-strung people. Evening social activities are inviting.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Face a difficult situation head on and you will find a solution more quickly. A relative or friend comes to your aid in a meaningful way. Stick to your diet and exercise resolutions.

CAPRICORN Finishing routine tasks early in the day will put you into a more productive state of mind. Avoid acting on impulse! Your loved ones expect you to make constructive decisions.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Guard against haste and carelessness today. Love and romance dominate your thoughts. Psychic phenomena hold new interest. A timely idea or hunch could prove very profitable.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Listen to those who are in a position to know what they are talking about. You can save yourself financial woes by checking your bank balance. A nice surprise is in store!

Water polo successful

By JOE DEGLORIA
Collegian Correspondent

It was not a great weekend for the University of Massachusetts water polo team. After cruising through Saturday's games with Queens and Fordham, the team suffered a very disheartening loss to Iona.

"I was very disappointed with the team this week, we had the wrong attitude going into the Queens and Fordham games, and we created a lot of bad habits. We kept those habits going into the Iona game and we lost," coach Russ Yarworth said.

UMass blasted Queens Saturday 18-5. Alex Yelensky scored four times, Denny Kinne and Jon Miller each scored thrice.

UMass then played Fordham University and beat them 21-7. Miller and Yelensky each scored four times in the rout.

Even though UMass easily beat both Fordham and Queens, Yarworth said he was not overly pleased with his team's performance.

On Sunday, UMass went on to face the much tougher Iona team. UMass had played Iona already this season and beat them 8-4. They dropped the game 8-6 and Yarworth was very dissapointed.

"They were stuck in a poor flow," Yarworth said. "To lose such a game due to lack of concentration is devastating."

"Iona is a good team and they played tough but we definitely should have beat them," Yarworth said. "We are going to work really hard over the next week and a half and we are going to turn everything around for the next tournament."

The UMass team is off next weekend and Yarworth said he hopes that the extra time will give him a chance to re-focus the team's mind set towards playing. UMass could conceivably lose its top twenty ranking due to the Iona loss. Its record against other top twenty teams is now a disapointing 1-4. UMass is 9-4 for the season.

Music Department Profs perform tonight

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Correspondent

Professor Nigel Coxe, recently returned form a royal gala performance in Thailand, will be performing in a recital entitled "Basically Ballades" tonight at 8 p.m. at Bezane Hall at the Fine Arts Center. The performance includes two ballads by Robert Stern, professor of composition at the University of Massachusetts since 1964, as well as ballads by Greig, Chopin, Mozart and Gershwin.

"I think my colleague has written two great masterpieces. I'm proud to be the first to play them," Coxe says of the pieces written by Stern for the recital. "Dr. Stern knew of my interest in American pop music when he handed 'Ballades' over to me."

Coxe says he tries to give a concert with a focus, comparing it to an art exhibition. "The ballad has a long musical history. It was originally a song. In the 19th century, it was called a 'ballade.' [That term] was first used by Chopin to entitle an instrumental without words."

Coxe said [the ballad] has always had a heroic quality. He explains that in the 20th century tradition, it was applied to American popular music. "Chopin and Greig are the two most famous of the 19th century tradition as it has been and now it goes on. Dr. Stern is part of that great tradition of greats," Coxe said.

Coxe has been on the UMass faculty for 17 years and his CD, Showstoppers, is music composed by Gershwin. His performance of Grainger's works is also available on CD and has been a best-seller for two years.

Grainger, as composer, is considered to be a 20th century great. As a young man, he was a close friend of Greig's. Coxe said the piece he plans to perform is extremely difficult and is not normally played by performers.

The presenations of Mozart will precede both Greig and Chopin in the piano solo concert because [Greig and Chopin] venerated him.

Coxe said Mozart died about 20 years before Chopin was born and in [Mozart's] music, there can be heard scenes of what is to come from the two other composers.

Stern arranged his piece last year, originally there were three and they were intended for the piano and double bass.

"I took two of them and arranged them for a piano solo. They are pop ballads," said Stern concerning the origination of his works.

Tonight's performance is a guaranteed exciting exhibit of the long history of ballads. Show starts at 8 p.m.

Blues Traveler's music travels into the Horse

Blues Travelers
Iron Horse
Thursday, Sept. 27

Shortly before the boys in blue nabbed me red-handed with a pinch of green, I was having a golden evening at the Iron Horse. The band was Blues Travelers, and they were overwhelming

That night I was completely mesmerized by the talent and shear stamina of undoubtedly the largest stage presence I have ever seen. I speak of John Popper, who is musically as well as physically the greatest harmonica player I have know of.

He spoke through a Hohner Special 20, which he cupped in his contrastingly delicate hands. He sang too, and had a voice – though I couldn't understand a word he said. He played vigorously on an acoustic guitar with no pick. The rest of the band was decidedly electric. But when he pressed that little silver harp to his face, things became ineffable.

Apparently channeling a force form deep within himself, he closed his eyes and blew the crowd away. The man transcends breathing. In awe, I staggered over to a man sketching peacefully in a corner near the stage. This was Tim Vega, official artist of the Blues Travelers. He told me that the band had come from New Jersey to play in New York City where he first saw them.

REVIEW

Through friendliness, dedication, talent and a sense of adventure, Tim soon evolved from graffiti artist to fan, form fan to friend of the band and now he too, is a blues traveler. Vega designs poster and shirts for these incredible musicians.

Their audience couldn't help but dance, though lack of space for dancing at the Horse tends to discourage it. There was really something celebrated and inspired, wild and even reckless about this band. Believe me, it was an unforgettable start to an unforgettable night.

The men's tennis team lost 8-1 to Providence yesterday.

PC serves men's tennis 8-1 loss

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team is looking for direction.

Once a powerful 3-0 team packing a great deal of confidence and strength, the Minutemen are now looking at a possible disheartening, sub-par season.

The Minutemen traveled to Providence College yesterday where they were handed their fourth straight loss, 8-1.

The Minutemen were able to win only one match, a nine game 'pro-set' (first to win nine games) between the opposing number three doubles teams.

Nonetheless, UMass coach Manny Roberts still insisted that the 8-1 final score didn't reflect the closeness of the match.

UMass' number one singles player Barry Wadsworth suffered a crucial break of serve in the first set which resulted in a disappointing 6-4, 6-4 defeat by Providence's Jeff Mourneau. Also proving the tight match was UMass' Tim Lipsky's battle with Steve Galley which went to a tie breaker in the first set and ended up in a 7-6 (7-3), 6-4 victory for Providence.

UMass' number five singles player Chuck Rubin looked impressive in the first set against Providence's Steve Sullivan, however, he was unable to maintain his intensity for the rest of the match as Sullivan came back to win 4-6, 6-4, 6-2.

As a result of Providence's commanding 6-0 sweep of singles play, the doubles matches had no bearing on the outcome of the match. Nonetheless, UMass' Lenny Levine and Rubin teamed up for the lone Minutemen victory, 9-5, to avoid a shutout.

"The match could have went one way or another. One little break here and there and the outcome may have been reversed," said Roberts.

Roberts said a few players were noticeably dissatisfied with their performances, yet as a team they "still have their heads up."

An intermittant, yet key player for UMass has been Paul Audet, who was out for the Providence game with a stress fracture in his foot. He was injured at the New Hampshire match several weeks ago. His status has changed day to day.

With only two matches remaining in the season, the Minutemen must quickly find a way to return to their early season form, in which they convincingly dominated their opponents.

"Hopefully we can turn things around and get back above .500," said Roberts.

Olson discovers set-up

By HOWARD ULMAN
The Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) — Director of the Harvard Law School for Criminal Justice Philip Heymann, who investigated the Nixon administration's Watergate scandal, was named Monday to investigate beat writer Lisa Olson's claims that New England Patriot players sexually harassed her. The appointment by NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue came amid expressions of concern by players that the probe could cause dissention on a team already struggling on the field.

The Boston Herald reporter Olson said that on Sept. 17, as she was interviewing cornerback Maurice Hurst at his locker, tight end Zeke Mowatt exposed himself to her. She said two or three other players, whom she could not identify, walked naked toward her and stopped briefly near her. At least one other player made suggestive remarks, she added.

Olson said Monday she had been told by Patriot players, whom she did not identify, that the incident was planned to see how she would react.

Between Monday and Thursday of last week, players involved in the alleged plan met to coordinate their stories and let Mowatt take the blame because he was the only player she could identify, Olson said she was told.

Reds split Virginia games

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Bruised, aching and hospitalized characterizes the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team after a split weekend in Virginia.

"It was a another tough weekend," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "We almost routed them . . . we had chances they weren't even smelling."

Unfortunately, Virginia smelled the coffee by the end of the first half when leading-scorer Andrea Rubio turned and shot the first goal. Virginia's sophomore has nine goals and eight assists for the season.

The score remained 1-0 to the half. In what Rudy described as "either an incredible shot or a chip-and-hope," Tracy DiMillio scored the final goal of the game, as Virginia came away with the 2-0 shutout. But they did not walk away with it, according to Rudy.

"It was a hard fought game," he said. "They felt fortunate the score was what it was. They said we were one of the best teams they encountered."

Briana Scurry started in goal for UMass and played an impressive game, said Rudy. Scurry came away from the game with seven saves, Virginia with eight.

Shots on goal were fairly even, but again UVA had the upperhand 15-14. Virginia also had more than double the scoring opportunities with cornerkicks. Rudy said a slew of four corners in a row were batted out to a determined defense.

"We had six really good chances," he said. "Amy Trunk and Kim Eynard took some wonderful shots."

St. Mary's did not even show up, according to Rudy. He cited their travel fatigue as completely wiping them out.

"They were a pretty attacking team," he said. "They just weren't there. Basically, we dominated play."

On a long free kick, Suzy Woods crammed the ball into the far corner of the net for the first and only goal of the first half for St. Mary's.

UMass' Sue Gaudette was playing with a fever and shaking off chills, according to Rudy. But her health did not refrain her from connecting with the ball. Gaudette turned and hit a volley into the net to tie the game and take it into overtime.

With 20 minutes to go in regulation, Robin Runstein was kneed in the jaw by the Goalkeeper. She was taken out of the game with a bruised jaw, muscle spasms and a cramped neck; she was then hospitalized.

Not more than 10 minutes later, Aprile Kater was also taken out and soon after hospitalized with kidney complications. Rudy cited how often Kater was airborne and attributed the injury to her aggressive play.

Eynard, who survived a takedown attempt by a defender, went one-on-one with the goalkeeper to end the scoring in the second overtime 2-1.

"We've broken our string," Rudy said of lost and tied games. "I'm really proud of our people."

Norwich routes rugby 35-7

By DAVE SZPILA
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass rugby team traveled to Norwich University this weekend and came away empty for the first time in league play this season. UMass lost the Saturday matchup 35-7.

Facing a club that went into training two weeks before school even started (most teams wait until September), UMass seemed helpless against the speed of the Norwich backs and the constant movement of the club as a whole.

The first half of Saturday's game started off smooth for UMass. Scot Lowry kicked a penalty giving UMass an early 3-0 lead. Norwich came back soon thereafter with a try and took over the lead, one it would never lose. The half ended with Norwich up 17-3.

The second half was not much better than the first. Jerry Hunt scored a try early for UMass but that was all the team would get for the rest of the match. Norwich turned on the steam and rallied for 18 second-half points.

UMass will stay at home this weekend to face Dartmouth. Dartmouth has beaten Norwich this year by a score of 26-9.

Men's soccer battles Brown, players named All-Tourney

Challenge Cup Notebook

By GREG SUKIENNIK

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team ended their five-game losing streak Sunday. Now they're ready to start a winning streak.

The opportunity presents itself tonight at 7:30 p.m., as UMass travels to meet Brown in Providence, RI. The Bruins are currently 0-4-1 (0-2-1 in Ivy League play), and Minutemen coach Jeff Gettler is confident his team can "get the job done."

"Brown's strength is it's size and quickness," noted Gettler. "They're very direct in their approach — they'll try to beat opponents downfield or counterattack."

The Bruins have but three goals in five games, while allowing eight. The opposition has outshot them 83 to 58. One reason may be that like UMass, Brown is a young team. Only five seniors and seven returning scorers remain from last year.

"They present a good challenge for us," Gettler added. "Some of their strengths are our weaknesses. But we got two goals out of our offense against Rider, which we hadn't done for a while. If our defense can pick up the slack, we should win."

Tournament Notebook: The Massachusetts Challenge Cup All-Tournament team was announced Sunday afternoon following the UMass-Rider match. The Minutemen placed two players on the team; midfielder Brett Anthony and midfielder/defensive back Peter McEvoy. From Rider, goalkeeper Chip Maruca, forward Mike Hoff and midfielder Dave Parsha each earned All-Tournament honors.

First-place Maine and runners-up Drexel both placed three players on the squad as well. For the Black Bears, midfielders Mike McGuire and Pat Sniper and defender Peter Gardula made the squad. Drexel's Andy Barat, a midfielder, forward Jorge Garcia and keeper Rune Helgeland also made the team. Players selected to the team recieved 'All-Tournament' soccer jerseys. Maine looked flat in their win Saturday, as Rider goalie Maruca made offense difficult, if not impossible. Had it not been for a penalty kick by Rob Thompson at 33:50, the Black Bears might not have ever gotten one past Maruca, who made several brilliant saves. Most notable among them was a stop of John Mello's breakaway at 84:50.

UMass, Amherst join forces against CLT

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts and the Amherst community officially joined forces in opposing the tax rollback referendum question last night at the opening of the Amherst Democratic-Vote No On Three Headquarters.

"The CLT [Citizens for Limited Taxation] petition is a bad proposal for citizens, students, and businesses," said Gordon Oakes, chairman of the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees and president of Monarch Capital in Springfield.

"This proposal will have unintended results which will create chaos beyond anyone's wildest imagination," he said. "We do need to examine the restructuring of the state government and reevaluate state services, but we don't need to reduce revenues in a time of financial crisis beyond that the state can cope with."

The CLT petition will appear on the November 6 statewide ballot as Question Number Three. If passed by voters, the petition would rollback the state tax rates and imposed fees to 1988 levels. The Executive Office for Administration and Finance estimated a revenue loss of $1.355 billion from the 1991 state budget and a $2.5 billion loss from the 1992 budget.

The petition will not rollback any tuition or fee increases imposed on public higher education since 1988. University administrators have estimated if CLT passes the University budget would be reduced by $28 million at mid-year, a 40 percent reduction.

The administration released what their options would be if CLT passes yesterday.

- Annual tuition for in-state students would increase by $4,000.
- Over 1,400 state-funded employees, including 520 faculty, would lose their jobs.
- With fewer faculty, student enrollment would face a 40 percent reduction.
- The University would lose an additional $32 million because of faculty and student reductions, causing a loss of 500 additional jobs. One out of three employees would be terminated in total.
- Regional business volume would lose an estimated $100 million.

Oakes said the University is the largest employer in Western Massachusetts and a large force in the local economy. The last three budget cuts to the University would "pale" next to the CLT reduction, he said.

Although he said the immediate impact of CLT would be devastating to public higher education, the long term effect would be "suicide" for the state economy.

'Higher education is an investment in the future of the state," he said. "Educational opportunities would be denied to the students of this state who become members of the work force."

Oakes said he belongs to a segment of the business community who opposes CLT. The Amherst Chamber of Commerce also voted to oppose ballot question number three yesterday morning.

State schools need better fundraising to protect against cuts

BOSTON (AP) — State colleges and universities in Massachusetts need to do a better job of private fundraising to make themselves less vulnerable to cuts in state appropriations, a legislative committee recommended Tuesday.

The Senate Post Audit and Oversight Committee acknowledged that Massachusetts' public colleges and universities face stiff competition from private colleges and universities for endowment dollars.

But Sen. Richard Kraus, D-Arlington, the committee chairmen, said the trend must be reversed if higher education in Massachusetts is to thrive.

"Higher education in the current fiscal crisis has taken lots of hits," Kraus said. "What our institutions have to fall back on in terms of endowment funds is pitifully small."

The committee's report showed that endowments raised by Massachusetts public institutions of higher education were a 20th of the national average, Kraus said.

The University of Massachusetts' endowment ranks 75th among endowments of 76 nationally ranked public higher education institutions, the report said.

The report also noted that 13 of the 27 public higher education campuses in Massachusetts had no endowment funds at all.

The report also noted that only 25 percent of all Massachusetts colleges and universities are public, while nationally, public institutions make up 45 percent of colleges and universities.

Massachusetts has the lowest ratio of public to private institutions of higher education in the country, the report said.

Kraus said the alumni of Massachusetts public colleges and universities are "relatively young and relatively scarce" but he said the problem is more reluctance on the part of college officials to try to raise more private dollars.

He acknowledged that part of that fear may be a worry that successful private fundraising could mean smaller state appropriations.

The Post Audit Committee recommended calling on the state to provide one public dollar for each $2 of private funds raised by state colleges and universities.

"This is obviously not the year that is going to be initiated," Kraus said, pointing to the state's lingering fiscal crisis.

The committee also called on the Board of Regents of Higher Education to promote endowment building.

"If we're going to have a stable and successful system of higher education, this is a problem that has to be addressed," said Kraus, a former administrative dean at Harvard's graduate school.

BCC recruits

UM responds with pamphlet

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE

Editor's note — This is the third in a series of articles addressing the Boston Church of Christ.

"The University of Massachusetts at Amherst with 25,000 students has already proven to be a field ripe for harvest; a number have been converted from the campus including several varsity football players. Other campuses include Smith College, Amherst College, Mt. Holyoke College, Hampshire College, Springfield College, American International College, Western New England College and Holyoke Community College." [Reprinted from the Dec. 1988 Bulletin of the Boston Church of Christ.]

Jim Reid, University of Massachusetts football coach, said he would rather have his players involved with a religious group than drugs, but maintained he does not allow recruitment for other groups on his team. He cited two years ago when the team wanted to have mock presidential elections but he wouldn't allow it, saying it would create unneeded schisms.

However, some administrators at UMass think that the BCC is capable of creating too many schisms and have responded with a pamphlet, indirectly aimed at the BCC.

GEO signs agreement

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY

University of Massachusetts administration signed an agreement Monday permitting the Graduate Employee Organization to hold an election that will determine if GEO will officially represent graduate employees in contract negotiations with the administration.

Around October 26, ballots will be sent to all Teaching Assistants, Research Assistants and Teaching Associates who will vote on whether or not they want GEO, an affiliate of District 65 United Auto Workers, to represent them in "good faith negotiations" with the administration.

According to GEO spokeperson Elizabeth Kruse, there are between 2100 and 2400 TA's, TR's, and RA's on campus. The election agreement makes all of them eligible to vote.

If the outcome of the election will be in favor of GEO, it will attain the negotiation power of a union that it has been seeking since last spring.

The GEO is confident that it will win the election.

Study reveals UM sciences improved

By STEVEN DAMIANI
Collegian Correspondent

According to a recent study conducted by the Institute for Scientific Information, the University of Massachusetts is one of the "Ten Most Improved U.S. Universities in Science."

The study was published in "Science Watch," a journal that follows trends in basic research among universities across the nation.

The results of the study were arrived at by determining the "citation impact" of scientific articles eminating from the top 100 research institutions.

The "citation impact" was determined by calculating how many times research papers, which were published in over 3,000 scientific journals, were cited by other scientists, according to Ric Shanor of the University Press Office.

Shanor said in 1982, research funding was about $18 million at UMass. This year, the University will receive approximately $60 million.

In another classification by ISI last year, Amherst was ranked third (after Boston and Cambridge) among Massachusetts cities and towns for its large number of publishing scientists.

In the last decade the Amherst campus, which is the largest public research campus in New England, has attained an international reputation in polymer chemistry, radio astronomy, engineering, computers and software, robotics, and the physical and biological sciences.

The National Science Foundation reported that in New England only Harvard University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology produced more Ph.D.'s in science and engineers than UMass.

Heading the list of "Ten Most Improved U.S. Universities" was the University of South Alabama, the University of Houston and Brigham Young University, UMass, the University of California, Creighton University and the University of Vermont.

Charges run up on stolen credit card

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN

A Coolidge Residence Hall man reported to University Police Sunday that his leather jacket and wallet was taken from his room sometime prior to Sunday.

When the man reported the theft to his credit card companies, they reported charges in excess of $500.

The estimated value is $850.

LARCENY

• Police reported that a vehicle in Lot 22 was broken in to sometime Saturday. The vehicle was rifled and 20 cassette tapes were stolen. The estimate value is $200.

• Staff in the Morrill Science Center reported to police Monday morning that an Apple computer worth $2300 had been stolen over the weekend.

• A woman in Emerson Residence Hall reported to police Monday evening that upon returning to her locked room she discovered that two gold chains had been stolen from her bed stand. The estimated value is $600.

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — Charges have been dropped against five protesters, ranging in age from 41 to 78, who were scheduled to be tried for trespassing at the University of Massachusetts.

The five were arrested May 9, 1989, when they refused to leave the office of Chancellor Joseph Duffey. The incident came during a wave of protests against military research at the University. They were found guilty of that charge and placed on probation.

The second set of charges arose from a May 11 visit to the campus after the group had been ordered to stay away.

The protests focused on research at the University on the anthrax virus. Protesters maintain the Department of Defense-funded research was aimed at developing an offensive biological weapon. University officials countered that the research was on a non-virulent strain of the disease and had no offensive application.

Assistant District Attorney Frederic Bartmon filed papers in Northampton District Court Monday recommending that the second charges be dropped.

"In light of the full prosecution of the May 9th incident and the defendants' compliance with the trespass notice and the laws generally, it is in the best interest of justice that this matter not be prosecuted at this time," he wrote.

Charged in the May 11 incident were Margaret Holt, 78, of Amherst, Rosemary Heidkamp, 31, of Wendell, Meryl Nass, 38, of Wilbraham, Kenton Tharp, 41, of Amherst and Harriet Nestel, 50, of Leverett.

Voter information to be supplied

By STACY NEALE
Collegian Correspondent

The League of Women Voters in Amherst works to provide crucial voting and election information and research of various local, state, and national issues to aid voters in making decisions at the polls, according to an organizer.

"The League produces Voter's Guides which provide information about candidates and referendum questions. We hand these out at every election," Lois Dethier, a League organizer said.

Currently there are 208 members, 20 of whom are men.

"The only requirement of our members are that they are Amherst residents and at least 18 years of age," Dethier said.

This includes the town of Amherst students as well as full-time residents.

"We encourage students who are interested in government to participate," Dethier said. The League offers various research topics for students to gain valuable experience.

The League also holds public nonpartisan debates. The first one of the semester will be held October 4th, at 7 p.m., at the Amherst Regional Junior High School. The debates will be for the State Representative of the Third Hampshire District, and the candidates for State Senator of Franklin and Hampshire Counties.

This year the Amherst League will hold public meetings on the issue of child abuse.

"Our main objective is to promote political responsibility and participation in all levels of government," Dethier said.

For the past two years the League has been studying how Amherst town meetings, boards, and committees interact with each other in order to provide successful leadership.

On the national front, the League of Women Voters is in its second year of studying financing health care.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian, or the University unless otherwise noted.

Madson adds insult to injury

I am writing this editorial in response to the rally for the Everywoman's Center that I attended today. The rally was completely organized by students outside of the EWC (i.e. from SGA, GSS, POWER, and other concerned groups).

Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson was invited to tour the EWC to see what damage the cuts have already caused.

Swati Joshi

We waited outside the building for his exit, wanting to have a word with him.

However, when he came outside, he did not acknowledge our presence or even look at us, but went directly to his car.

I was infuriated; never have I been so insulted. But of course, it was rather characteristic of Madson to ignore the concerns of women on this campus, and I shouldn't have been so surprised. His car had the bumper sticker "Cutting Colleges Costs the Commonwealth," but he obviously hasn't read it lately.

After he drove off, we chanted our way to Whitmore, where we proceeded upstairs to his office to leave messages for him, which I hope he will actually read.

I attempted to make an appointment to speak with him sometime in the near future, but was told that due to the trouble with the cuts, his schedule is "swamped" for weeks. I don't know who he is planning to meet for the next couple days, but is probably not with students.

Madson seems to feel that the EWC is expendable, a "neat little cut" to make in the budget, but he doesn't know how wrong he is. The EWC has been in an crucial lifesaving force for countless women on this campus.

This is not a white male University, Madson, and we women have an important voice in what goes on. Of the employees relocated from the EWC to other jobs on campus, a majority of them were transferred to his personal office.

Does he think that his own office staff is more important than the lives of women on this campus? Those counselors were the lifeblood of many students. Who is going to counsel them now? I hear Madson has a little experience in counseling. Why don't I just send my friends to him the next time they want help in coming out as lesbians, or treating an eating disorder?

The way the cuts are going, it seems that the next wave of budget cuts is going to decrease the EWC's efficiency even more. The ongoing game plan seems to be to reduce the EWC to it s bare bones as a rape crisis center.

This ends out a terrible message to myself and to many other females, that we are not important until we are raped. Any other needs that we might have just don't matter. Further down the road, Madson may decide that the EWC existing "solely as a rape crisis center really isn't needed anymore;" he may consolidate them with the University Health Services.

Being raped is not the same thing as having a little cold, and the UHS is not enough. I'll be damned if I have to sit in line with a thermometer in my mouth while waiting to be treated after an assault. Where is your daughter or wife to go?

It has been said that you always have your ear to the pulse of the campus when making political decisions. Well, this campus is very concerned.

By making these cuts, which are disproportional when compared to cuts faced by other departments, you are automatically hurting 50 percent of the students and faculty at this university.

We will not be satisfied and we will not be silent until the positions that were relocated are sent back to the EWC

Attempt to degrade women veils itself under the guise of concern

When you rape, wear a condom?

Was it some sort of covert attempt to prove the need for the Everywoman's Cneter? No. It was a masturbatory attempt to degrade women that veiled itself under the guise of concern for women.

Most men need to get into their heads that "no" menas NO. If the woman was drunk, she is not in a position to say yes or no.

Why is it that if the rapist was drunk, he would likely be acquitted or given a greatly reduced sentence. But if the woman was drunk, it would be her fault for being vulnerable.

Mr. Erickson is trying (at least, I hope he is) to understand date rape from a woman's perspective. But, instead, he uses his story to turn a horrible rape into pornography with a woman's touch. Yes, rape.

Are we supposed to be excited with this story of violent sex, or are we supposed to feel compassion for the victims of rape?

It is not clear in Mr. Erickson's column.

He never mentions that dreaded R-word that defines men's actions as violence against women and as wrong.

Date rape is rape.

Sex with someone who cannot say "yes" is rape.

Mr. Erickson seemed unable to say a very important word.

I will have to make up for that. RAPE.

Credit card thief a manifestation of all things evil in the world

This is an open letter to the beautiful person who happened upon my Visa Gold card a couple of weeks ago.

Upon returning from the Textbook Annex, I noticed my Visa card was missing. I called the Annex immediately but, of course, it had already closed. By the time I did reach somebody, two days had passed, and I was told they couldn't find it. So I cancelled it.

On my way from Delaware last weekend, I stopped by New Jersey to see my folks. They had some grim news for me. The Visa bill had come in the mail. Apparently, you, the lucky winner of my credit card, had a great big party. A $5,000 party.

On Sept. 11, there is a charge to Radio Shack for $6.50. That's mine. The next entry is also Sept. 11 — $1,276 to a local jeweler. Following are several more entries — a couple of hundreds bucks at a time — to various women's clothing stores.

Even the most generous of husbands, fiancees, boyfriends or what have you would have to, at least, stop at a hardware store. So my assumption is that you are a woman.

This is, of course, a moot point, although it does cut my suspects in half. Unfortunately for you, however, the jeweler probably has a security camera, and not only will I have your gender down, but in all likelihood, a handsome portrait as well.

I feel sorry for you and for all those who you've shared free air with. You alone are responsible for the state of the world we live in. You would probably like me to call you a result of society, rather than the cause of its cancer. But that's not the way it's going to be, because you were born with a conscience, just like me.

There is nothing more personally gratifying than to have the ability to turn the other cheek. But would I like to find your misplaced Mastercard — I'd hunt you down and give it back.

Preacher spurs an examination of beliefs

Last Thursday, as I was walking past the Student Union, I noticed a large gathering of people, so I decided to see what was going on.

There was a man standing in a semicircle of students, talking about how Christianity is "reliable." He was answering questions and trying to prove why Jesus was the best way to go. Some people were truly interested, others stayed to make a point and some were there just to be obnoxious.

I couldn't understand why this person didn't stop preaching to us and leave us alone. So, I'm sitting there, listening to this guy tell me why Jesus is so reliable and wonderful, when this woman comes over and introduces herself as being from the Intravarsity Christian Fellowship and asked if she could talk to me about what I thought of Cliff (the preacher person) and what he was saying. To humor her, I said yes.

She asked me if I was practicing a religion, and I answered that I was a practicing Jew. We began to talk about what Cliff was trying to say and discussed the good points of both Judaism and born-again Christianity.

Soon, another person, a Catholic by birth who was interested in the Jewish religion, came over to listen. The three of us wound up having an interesting discussion about religion and its importance in life, no matter what religion it may be.

My first reaction to Cliff and all these gung-ho Christians was anger. Why should they be trying to change my mind when I'm perfectly happy being Jewish (OK, Yom Kippur's not so wonderful but it's not that bad).

Then, as I was talking to these people, I realized that Cliff was there just to get us to think. No one made me sit down and listen, why should I feel threatened? Having a chance to talk to people with beliefs different than mine gave me a chance not only to learn about other people's ideas, but to re-evaluate my own.

I realized why I continue to practice Judaism, even though I am no longer living with my parents. And it was interesting to get a different person's perspective on life, death and life after death. It was worth the time I spent there.

Republic's politics ignores North's struggle

The Irish Republic, a Vichy state engaged in cannibalism, is set to hold on November 7, its first contested election for president in 17 years. The principal parties involved are familiar ones — Fianna Fail, Fine Gael, and of course "Labor." These parties have been stabbing Irish workers in the backs for years, and we can expect only more business as usual after November. We've seen them in action.

Owen Broadhurst

Fianna Fail is the ruling party, composed of collaborators, traitors, liars, and Taoiseach (or Prime Minister) Charles Haughey — who beggars description. Alleged patriots, this party claims to want a United Ireland, but apparently not in our lifetime.

This party has probably been the most cannibalistic, extraditing Irish patriots and freedom fighters to face questionable British "justice" apologizing for the brutal British occupation of the north, and imposing such economic hardship on Irish that many were — still are — forced to leave.

Fianna Fail has actively worked with the Thatcher government to silence the resistance, and it has suppressed the right of nationals abroad to participate in elections.

Fianna Fail is also responsible for the latest flood of Irish "illegals," forced to make a living under the table because one cannot even find menials job in Ireland. Haughey helped create unemployment through Reganesque deficit spending and tax cuts.

Now, Fianna Fail seems to be sending the Unionists in the north a message that articles in Ireland's constitution which lay claim to the north are negotiable. Moreover, despite even the reservations of a Fianna Fail-stacked Supreme Court over British justice — a court that has never before failed to see patriots extradited — Haughey still will set the stage for more Guildford Fours by trdting British "justice."

It is hard to distuingish Fianna Fail from Fine Gael, except that Alan Duke's Fine Gael party — which seems less adept in exploiting nationalistic fervor — sides with Unionists in regards to the constitution of the Republic of Ireland.

Fianna Fail seems honestly divided over that issue now. Minister for Defense, Brian Lenihan, will be Fianna Fail's nominee to battle Austin Currie from Fine Gael and Mary Robinson for Labor.

Fine Gael once shared power with Labor before the Haughey government, which certainly says enough for Labor. To say the least, Labor's base went running and the party may never reach its former strength again.

Fine Gael's nominee was once involved in the Social Democratic and Labor Party, based in the north, which is funded by the National Endowment for Democracy — the same CIA front which helped finance Violetta Chamorro's campaign in Nicaragua.

Fine Gael and SDLP both dismiss even the thought of a United Ireland, and ignore British violence in the north. SDLP has even criticised the MacBride principles.

These views are not seen as extreme in Ireland, where they have been echoed by Fianna Fail members who want Irish to "get to grips with the Unionist point of view," or Bob Geldof, H.M.S., who knelt before the Queen of England and thinks Irish emigrants are "killers".

In fact, the British soldiers are doing a good deal of the killing right now. Children who spray-paint Republican grafitti risk being shot. If one is suspected of being a freedom fighter, no human rights remain inviolable. Jim Crow segregation is the rule, a way of life. British soldiers supply the names of outspoken patriots to Unionist assassins in order to silence them. Prison conditions are most deplorable.

Not one of the three parties will speak out and help their brothers in the north. It's not expedient.

Congressman Joe Kennedy was told by one British soldier, while visiting the north, "Go back to your own country." Said Kennedy, "You go back to yours."

It is high time that the government of Ireland did the same.

The idea was spurned from meetings this summer in which students and various administrators expressed concern over the widespread manipulation that has been attached to the BCC.

"Protect Yourself From Destructive Religious Groups," was compiled by several campus ministries (Hillel, Newman Center and the United Christian Foundation) with information provided by the United Ministry at Harvard-Radcliffe. It warns against groups that claim "totalistic control over member's daily lives; prohibition of critical analysis and independent thinking and questioning."

Boston College, Northeastern University and the University of New Hampshire have all banned the BCC from their campuses.

Jerry Boyd's hometown is Melrose, Mass. and was a member of the BCC from the end of his senior year in high school until about one year ago. While sitting outside his apartment building one afternoon with his father, the junior English major was approached by a woman asking whether he would like to join a bible study.

Boyd said they showered him with attention and intense one-on-one bible studies with another man during which he was called "prideful" or "selfish." These bible studies were not with an elder of the church, per se, but rather an individual who might have been there a mere three weeks longer than the disciple.

Before his baptism into the BCC and prior to his first year at UMass, Boyd was advised not to attend the University. He was told it was a fledgling church with a weak ministry and that he was sure to "fall away" if he chose to attend.

"I will go where I want to go," Boyd told them. He was baptised and immediately he recognized the attention once showered on him was no longer evident.

He has since chosen to leave the church because he felt they were insincere. Their group, he says, is conservative and condemns lifestyles, not people. Boyd said it was a learning experience and that he would do it over again were he given the opportunity, but that he would also leave the group as well.

said Kruse. If that happens, the GEO will begin discussions with the administration concerning the impact of the recent budget cuts on graduate student employees, she said.

The GEO will also immediately proceed with the negotiations concerning a $175 curriculum fee waiver for the spring semester, Kruse said.

Earlier in the semester, the administration waived the fall curriculum fee for graduate student employees, in return for which the GEO sighed a no-strike clause.

As part of the election agreement, the GEO cannot strike until November 30. If if wins the election, the GEO will sign another no-strike clause until April 15, Kruse said.

Presently, the GEO and the administration are interviewing possible candidates for a neutral third party representatives who will supervise the upcoming election.

According to Kruse, a representative of the American Arbitration Association will be interviewed in the next several days.

Rep. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) said he wants to increase the number of people from the private sector who are vocal in their opposition to CLT

The headquarters, located at 51 North Pleasant St., was created by the Amherst Town Democratic Committee for campaign work for local Democratic candidates and for opposition against the CLT petition.

Some 200 community members signed up for anti-CLT volunteer work Monday night, according Stan Rosenberg. Student Trustee Angus McQuilken estimated that 75 students have volunteered on the Vote No on 3 campaign on campus.

Karate Health Center dispells myth

By SARAH GOLD
Collegian Correspondent

The movie titles for karate films pretty much tell the whole story: "An Eye for an Eye," "Game of Death," "Bloodfist." Worrying about which one to bring home from the video store is never a problem, since any one will be basically the same as all the others. There will always be one good guy and about 30 bad guys, but no matter in the world of movie karate.

Chuck Norris and Bruce Lee are so manly that they can flatten entire armies of Uzi-weilding terrorists with nothing but a few well-placed hook kicks.

These guys seem to go out looking for fights; they are always challenging large, muscular black belts to "do or die" in the ring, or hanging around seedy bars waiting for some chump to look at their girl sideways.

> "I never judge anyone if they walk in here looking like the Pillsbury dough boy . . . because I was like that."
> – Larry Kelley, co-owner of Karate Health Fitness Center

Ex-green beret instructors screaming at their students to "kill or be killed?" Hoods with attitudes who like to break people's noses? Hostile teenagers whose mommies never loved them?

Apparently not, if the members of the Karate Health Fitness Center in South Amherst are any indication.

"Of course there is a violent aspect to karate," Larry Kelley said, the black belt founder and co-owner of the studio which occupies the top floor of a warehouse on West Street. "But violence is not what karate is about. The movies focus on the violent aspect because movies have to have drama.

"People who watch karate movies aren't interested in seeing Joe Schmo going to the karate studio, doing a workout, and feeling better about themselves," he said. "They want to see somebody throwing spinning sidekicks at thugs in a subway station. So they get this distorted view."

Kelley, who was rated the number one light-heavyweight karate fighter in New England from 1977-1982, and was one of the top 10 in the nation from 1979-1892, actually has a reputation in the karate world for protesting the encouragement of violence.

For several years, he has been campaigning against mail-order companies which offer dangerous Ninja weapons such as swords and sabers.

"Anyone can just fill out a form and order these things," said Kelley, who worries that the weapons may find their way into the hands of children or people who don't know how to use them.

His protests against this have included letters sent to all the senators in the United States, and a TV demonstration of several weapons on ABC's 20/20 in 1985.

Although a bill was filed in the U.S. Senate to ban the mail- order catalogs, it did not pass. However, Kelley said he feels that "the publicity we gave to the issue and the spotlight we turned on these companies has really made a difference . . . at least it alerted parents that their kids could be playing with this stuff in their backyards."

Kelley also disagrees with all the recent hype about Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles because he thinks that it glorifies and romanticizes the Ninja, who were really nothing but hit men in 16th century Japan.

"They were basically hired assassins. They killed people for money," he said. "There's nothing glorious about that."

It makes you wonder what you'd find inside your neighborhood karate studio.

No mo' gung-ho

Gabe Smallman, a 17-year-old brown belt who has been at the studio for six years, agreed that the atmosphere of KHFC is nonviolent.

> "But it's good, you know, to be able to sweat and work hard and get kicked in the head without crying. It helps you deal better with life."
> – Jason Perry, an instructor

"People who come in here with these gung-ho attitudes, like they really want to hurt people, they leave almost right away. We don't go for that stuff around here," he laughed. "A lot of us just came here because we were insecure."

Seeing the muscular builds, easy banter and confident swagger of the KHFC men, it's hard to believe that any of them were ever insecure. But they open up easily when asked about it.

"Oh, definitely, I was a total loser before I started karate," says Kirik Jenness, the tall, friendly black belt who co-owns the studio with Kelley. "I was terrible at sports because I was so small, and the kids at my prep school used to call me 'Flunky' because I failed all my classes . . . I had like no friends . . . karate totally saved my life."

Kelley has a similar story. "When I started I was 5'7' and I weighed 210 pounds," he said, producing an eighth-grade yearbook photo of a fat, extremely unhappy-looking boy. "I never judge anyone if they walk in here looking like the Pillsbury dough boy, because I was like that."

Smallman admits, "I was basically short, fat, and obnoxious. I had no respect and I was totally rude; I never said please or thank you or sir or ma'am. I was a disgrace."

Black belt KHFC instructor Adam Sloat, who was one of the first students at the studio when it opened in 1981, speaks of how karate changed his life.

"I was very shy and self-conscious in high school and I was made fun of a lot. I had so much trouble dealing with it that I wound up dropping out of school. I was really lucky to have this place; I don't know where the hell I'd be today if I hadn't found it.

"Karate gave me the opportunity to be good at something . . . every time I overcame a setback, or dealt with an injury, or finally learned how to do a kick the way I wanted to, I realized more and more that I wasn't a totally worthless human being. Now that I have the confidence to say, 'hey, I can do whatever I set my mind to,' I'm back in school again, and instead of flunking out I'm a straight-A student."

Gain from pain

Most at the studio agree that the inner confidence they have gained from karate has stemmed from their increased fitness and physical power.

Jason Perry, a 19-year-old brown belt instructor, said, "You have to be able to deal with a certain amount of pain [to know karate]. Everybody is bad for a while when they first come here . . . it takes perseverence before you build up your endurance enough to start improving. But it's good, you know, to be able to sweat and work hard and get kicked in the head without crying. It helps you deal better with life."

> "Knowing that you could put up a fight if you had to keeps you from carrying yourself like a victim."
> – Donna Kelly, co-owner

Sloat agreed. "When I first started I couldn't do a single pushup. Half of the confidence I've gained has been from watching myself get stronger. Now I can look in the mirror" — he flexed his muscles and mock-sneered — "and know that nobody is ever going to stuff me in a gym locker again."

Interestingly, almost none of the members here have ever used their karate outside of the carpeted, mirrored fighting room of the studio. Kelley, who worked as a bouncer at The Pub, a local bar, for three years, said that although he was involved in verbal altercations almost every night, he never once had to use physical force with anybody.

"The confidence you get from karate changes the whole way you come across to people . . . even if you're just having a verbal argument with someone, you can assert yourself better because you know if it ever came to blows you could handle it. People [at The Pub] could just tell from the way I spoke to them that they didn't want to mess with me."

Walking without fear

Kelley's wife, Donna, who is the third co-owner of the studio and was rated number one in New England for women's karate fighting in 1982 and 1983, said that it is especially important for women to have physical confidence.

"There are so many crimes being committed out there, and so many of them are against women . . . it's terrible that women have to walk around in fear anytime they're alone or someplace dark . . . karate helps to calm that fear. Knowing that you could put up a fight if you had to keeps you from carrying yourself like a victim."

Another female KHFC member, Julie Chartier, said that even though she knows her karate would help her if she were ever attacked, she takes even more precautions than most people to avoid being caught in a bad situation. "Just because I know karate doesn't mean I'm going to go walking down a dark alley if I don't have to," she said emphatically. "If anything, I would say that karate has made me more aware and more cautious of potentially dangerous situations."

Jenness shared Chartier's view.

"You get hit and kicked by people around here enough times. It's not so much fun that you're going to go out looking for someone out there to do it."

According to the KHFC instructors, who have seen their share of teaching tactics from other studios, the laid-back atmosphere of their studio seems to be the exception rather than the rule.

"Unfortunately any loser out there with a mail-order black belt can declare himself a grandmaster world champion, and get people to bow to him, and call him 'sensei' . . . and get a real big power trip out of it," Jenness said.

"I would say that nine out of 10 studios are like that," Sloat agreed. "It's really weird to think that most people out there never even speak to their instructors except to say, 'Yes, Master!' Here we all hang around together and drink beer on the weekends."

Mark Wisnewski, a green belt who has been at KHFC for six years, summed up the feelings of gratitude and respect that all the members seemed to feel for their instructors.

> – Adam Sloat, an instructor

"They never use their skills to intimidate; they never try to force you to respect them," he said. "You respect Larry and Kirik because they respect you. It would be so easy for them to play tough with every new white belt who walked in, and try to prove how powerful they are. Instead they try to show you how powerful you can be. They really believe that it's their job to help you feel good and be the best you can be."

So this is the truth to be found inside the mysterious walls of one neighborhood karate studio. Dedication, respect, acceptance.

What do these self-confident, empowered, enlightened people do for fun when they leave KHFC? You guessed it: watch Bruce Lee movies.

ARTS & LIVING

Keaton shines as Pacific Heights loses altitude

By GEORGE LENTZ
Collegian Staff

John Schlesinger's Pacific Heights is a yuppie nightmare. When first-time landlords Matthew Modine and Melanie Griffith take-in sinister tenant Michael Keaton, it's not their love they find threatened, but their real estate.

Having put every cent into refurbishing their San Francisco Victorian, the couple are in desperate need of high paying tenants to meet the payments on their mortgage and home improvement loan. So when Keaton shows up in his black Porsche with two grand in pocket change, Modine decides not to press him for credentials. What he should've done was check Keaton's brief case. He arrives armed to the teeth with enough knowledge of California law to milk the young couple dry — which is exactly what he's out to do. He's a scam artist from Hell, especially when he unleashes cockroaches into the apartment next door to run-out the other tenants.

His operation is smooth and vicious — moving in before Modine can get a security deposit from him and changing the locks. Once inside, he enacts his plan of not paying his rent and hammering and sawing at all hours of the night. Infuriated, Modine fights back by shutting off Keaton's utilities and ends up falling right into his trap. "If he's in, he has rights—that's it," their lawyer tells them after Keaton presses charges. With the state law protecting his every action, Keaton slowly drags them into bankruptcy with one civil suit after another until Griffith finds out how he operates and stages his undoing.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Keaton's the best thing in the film, maintaining an unnerving calm throughout (even when Modine throws him down a flight of stairs and through the front door) as he slowly catches the couple in his web. You get the feeling we're seeing another side of his Batman in this role as he sits in his darkened cave of an apartment, twirling razor blades between his fingers and fondling roaches. He's a strong presence but not strong enough to save the film.

Pacific Heights is the worst kind of thriller: one without thrills. The film is in dire need of an original lift, but Schlesinger doesn't seem to want to oblige. At his worst, Schlesinger uses the polished glow of his composition to cover his trite tactics — the film itself is a scam, posing as an innovative thriller while Schlesinger lifts elements of Fatal Attraction and The Hitcher to provide the conventional jolts.

It's possible that the film could have survived Schlesinger's creative block with some strong characterizations to pull the audience in where he slacked off, but Modine and Griffith just don't cut it. They have their obligatory first-night-in-our-new-home love scene and follow Schlesinger's lovebird directions with precision. All the right motions are there. The problem is, they never go further than that to give us any depth: we simply don't know anything about them outside of their concern to protect their investment, the only thing that seems to be tying them together. Pacific Heights isn't about saving a relationship in the face of tragedy. It's about saving your credit in the face of foreclosure.

CALVIN AND HOBBES
By BILL WATTERSON

HI, I'M CALVIN, EMINENT TELEVISION PERSONALITY, HERE TO TELL YOU ABOUT THEIR IMPROVED CHOCOLATE FROSTED SUGAR BOMBS' I LOVE 'EM!
THEY'RE CRUNCHY ON THE OUTSIDE, CHEWY ON THE INSIDE, AND THEY DON'T HAVE A SINGLE NATURAL INGREDIENT OR ESSENTIAL VITAMIN TO GET IN THE WAY OF THAT RICH, FUDGY TASTE! MM-MM!
YES KIDS, YOU'LL LIKE 'EM SO MUCH, YOU WON'T BE ABLE TO SIT STILL! REMEMBER! IT'S THE CEREAL I GET PAID TO RECOMMEND BECAUSE I'M FAMOUS!
WHAT DO YOU THINK? ARE YOU FILLED WITH THE DESIRE TO EMULATE ME AND EAT THE CEREAL I ENDORSE? IF NOT, I CAN REPEAT THIS EVERY 20 MINUTES.
DON'T YOU THREATEN ME

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) You are determined to get to know a fascinating person better! Take the initiative. You make impressive headway with important clients. Home improvement are foreshadowed.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Although concentration may be difficult during morning hours you should feel more focused by late afternoon. A family member's encouragement brings you special happiness.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Express yourself more forcefully. Be willing to make tough decisions. Although there may be previous obligations they will not stop you! Focus on work projects already under way.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Good vibrations surround this period. Fresh financial gains should not prompt a spending spree! Plan the wisest route to take with your money. Socializing can lead to new business contacts.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Favorable financial, vocational or health trends are indicated. Recent tensions fade. Use common sense when traveling and tact when talking. Romance is sweet. Show your sentimental side.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Seize an unexpected opportunity to secure financial gains. A verbal contract may work to your advantage. Creative self-expression wins you public recognition.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Your insights into the future may be astute except where your partner and finances are concerned. Travel plans are subject to change. Alter your social plans to accommodate your loved ones.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) A good day to review your career options. Do not rush or take things at face value. Discussing your plans with bystanders could backfire. Shun extreme diets. Stop eating on the run.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Take up an intellectual hobby and increase your knowledge. First impressions can be crucial. Pay more attention to your appearance. If making a key presentation, dress your best.

CAPICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Tackle paperwork today. Take advantage of favorable planetary aspects to get better organized. A platonic relationship takes on deeper meaning. Know your priorities.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) A communication could be misleading. Limit your social engagements if tired. Vague apprehensions are just that. Seek creative escapes. Stay within your budget if you go shopping.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Recycle an old idea or project to reap new profits. Your playful, fun-loving and creative side comes to the fore. You win admirers and charm the public. Social outings are favored.

the Design and Body exhibition in the Hampden Gallery at the University of Massachusetts.

The objects combine the laws of ergonomics with human comfort by customizing items of everyday use, including dinnerware for those with hand impairments, to sleek cross country ski gear for professional skiers. The show also takes a look at the history behind shoes and swimwear. 1940's clunky-heeled shoes are displayed next to Nike's Air Max model shoes and a long gray wool dress, used as a bathing suit in 1910, hangs next to a sleek Speedo racing suit.

The curators for the show are Deborah Olchowoski, a graduate student in the University's Interior Design program, and Fashion Marketing major Aurora Ferraro. Graduate Interior Design students Lynn Lukas, Ray Keifetz, and Sharon Oleksiak have assisted with the exhibit, especially with design.

Make time to check out this room full of objects that offer a flavor of future science — one that will ensure easier and more enjoyable mobility for all human beings.

Design and Body will run through Oct. 21, along with a national design symposium sponsored by the University: "The Designed Environment: Prospects for the Nineties," which will be presented by the Center for Studies in Contemporary Culture.

Hampden Gallery hours are Monday through Friday 3 p.m.-7 p.m. and Sunday 2 p.m.-5 p.m.

HERE'S WHY
THE SMART MONEY AT UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS
IS GOING WITH TIAA-CREF
AS IF THE FUTURE DEPENDED ON IT.

Because it does. Smart investors know that your future depends on how well your retirement system performs. TIAA-CREF has been the premier retirement system for people in education and research for over 70 years. We have enabled over 200,000 people like you to enjoy a comfortable retirement. And over 1,000,000 more are now planning for the future with TIAA-CREF.

SMART MONEY LOOKS FOR SECURITY, GROWTH AND DIVERSITY FOR RETIREMENT SAVINGS.

Security—so the resources are there when it is time to retire. Growth—so you'll have enough income for the kind of retirement you want. And diversity—to help protect you against market volatility and to let you benefit from several types of investments.

THAT'S EXACTLY WHAT YOU GET WITH TIAA-CREF.

TIAA offers you the safety of a traditional annuity that guarantees your principal plus a specified rate of interest, and provides for additional growth through dividends. CREF's variable annuity offers opportunities for growth through four different investment accounts, each managed with the long-term perspective essential to sound retirement planning:

The CREF Stock Account
The CREF Money Market Account
The CREF Bond Market Account*
The CREF Social Choice Account*

CALL 1-800-842-2776
TO FIND OUT MORE

Our experienced retirement counselors will be happy to answer your questions and tell you more about retirement annuities from TIAA-CREF.

Experience. Performance. Strength.
Your future is protected by the largest private retirement system in the world. We have done so well, for so many, for so long, that we currently manage some $85 billion in assets.

TIAA CREF
Ensuring the future for those who shape it.℠

* The CREF Bond Market and Social Choice Accounts may not be available under all institutional retirement plans, but are available for all Supplemental Retirement Annuity plans.

AP photo

Designated hitter Dwight Evans and the Boston Red Sox lost at Fenway Park to the Chicago White Sox, 3-2, in 11 innings last night.

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Red Sox failed to clinch the American League East title Tuesday night and sent the race down to the final day by losing to the Chicago White Sox 3-2 on Ozzie Guillen's two-out RBI single in the 11th inning.

Dennis Lamp (3-5), Boston's fourth pitcher, was unable to hold Chicago in the 11th after the Red Sox failed to score with the bases loaded and two out in the 10th against Donn Pall (3-5). Ellis Burks flied out to end the inning after and intentional walk to Wade Boggs.

Wayne Edwards, Chicago's fourth pitcher, pitched the 11th for his second save. Romine singled with to out but Pena forced Romine to end the game.

The Red Sox tied the score 2-2 in the bottom of the eighth just after the scoreboard showed that Toronto beat Baltimore on Fred McGriff's ninth-inning homer.

Tom Brunansky led off the inning with a double, just the fourth hit off Chicago starter Melido Perez. Jeff Stone ran for Brunansky and Bobby Thigpen relieved Perez. Pena sacrificed Stone to third and Danny Heep — hitting .174 — pinch hit for Luis Rivera and hit a sacrifice fly to score Stone.

The White Sox took a 1-0 lead in the first inning with the help of a balk by Tom Bolton. With one out, Lance Johnson extended his hitting streak to 13 games with a single and Carlton Fisk walked. The runners advanced on Bolton's walk and Frank Thomas hit a sacrifice fly.

Jody Reed opened the Boston first with a walk but was erased on a double play before the Red Sox tied the Score. Boggs singled, took third on Burks' double and scored on Perez' wild pitch.

Men's soccer downed by Brown, 3-1

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

This winless streak is getting redundant.

Last night in Providence, RI, Brown University posted their first win of the season over the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team, 3-1. The Bruins, now 1-4-1, scored once in the first half and twice in the second, holding UMass scoreless until Dan Lawrence connected on a penalty kick with less than three minutes left.

Brown first struck midway through the first half. Alexander Sahaydak won possession of the ball in a scramble in front of the goal and hit the net with a chip shot, giving the Bruins a 1-0 lead.

Brown iced the game on a successful Lacy penalty kick with six minutes left. With that third goal, the Bruins had matched their season scoring total in one game.

All that was left for the Minutemen was Lawrence's penalty kick, his first goal of the season.

UMass did not play well on offense, according to Pittman. The statistics bear this out; UMass and Brown both got off 18 shots on goal, yet the Minutemen could only captitalize once.

Minutemen coach Jeff Gettler said he was hoping that this game could provide his team with a tune-up win before Atlantic-10 Conference play resumes. Now, with three crucial conference games in seven days, all of which are on the road, the slumping Minutemen (2-7-1) are faced with grim prospects.

UMass has been on a winless streak since their last victory over New Hampshire (2-1). The defense, which played well up until the Massachusetts Challenge Cup, has allowed 13 goals in this seven-game stretch while the offense has mustered only six.

Calipari plans hoops Madness

Midnight Madness — featuring a dunk contest, free throw competition and a three-on-three tournament open to students — will return to the Cage on October 14, coach John Calipari announced.

Teams wishing to enter the three-on-three tournament should sign up in Boyden room 227 Thursday and Friday, between 10 a.m. - noon, and 1 p.m. - 3 p.m. Entries will also be accepted Tuesday Oct. 9, from 10 a.m. to noon. Both men's and women's teams will be entered.

The tournament will be played on Oct. 10 in Boyden Gym, with the final round to be held at Midnight Madness.

Coach Calipari also promised "hundreds of dollars" in giveaways, including gift certificates to local restaurants and two airline tickets to Florida, to be raffled off at the Cage.

Honors roll for 11th-ranked UMass

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

University of Massachusetts cornerback Don Caparotti, who intercepted two passes and ran one back 85 yards for a touchdown in Saturday's 47-16 win over Boston University, split Eastern College Athletic Conference Defensive-Player-of-the-Week honors with Dartmouth's Brad Peble.

Caparotti, a sophomore, recorded nine tackles against BU, and was also named to the Yankee Conference Honor Roll.

And the honors are starting to pile up for University of Massachusetts quarterback Gary Wilkos.

Wilkos, also a sophomore, was named Yankee Conference Co-Offensive Player-of-the-Week with Connecticut quarterback Cornelius Benton. Wilkos rushed for 106 yards and a touchdown and completed 13 of 18 passes for 198 yards against the Terriers. Wilkos was also named to the Eastern Conference Athletic Conference Honor Roll for the second consecutive week.

The Minutemen, now 2-0-1 overall and 2-0 in the Yankee Conference, jumped from No. 16 to No. 11 in this week's NCAA Division 1-AA poll. New Hampshire, at No. 6, is the only higher-ranked Yankee Conference team.

Around the Yankee Conference: UNH, at 3-0-1 overall and 3-0 in the league, still leads the Yankee Conference following its 21-21 tie with Dartmouth on Saturday. But the game raised some questions for the Wildcats.

Coach Bill Bowes pulled starting quarterback Matt Griffin in the second quarter after Griffin tossed his third interception of the half. Griffin had fumbled once as well. Terry O'Hare, a sophomore, replaced Griffin and completed four of five passes.

League-leading rusher Barry Bourassa scored two touchdowns and ran for 110 yards for UNH, but left the game in the fourth quarter with an injured shoulder. Bourassa is listed as questionable for the Wildcats' game against Richmond this weekend.

Kevin Wesley, half of Connecticut's hyped quarterback-fullback attack, went down with a bad knee in the Huskies' 44-7 win at Yale. If Wesley is out four weeks as expected, he will miss the UMass-UConn matchup on homecoming weekend, Oct. 13.

No. 1 battles No. 2 today at Totman

By TAMIR LIPTON

What do the University of Massachusetts and Northeastern field hockey teams have in common?

They are both coming off of losses to Old Dominion. Saturday ODU defeated UMass 4-0, and Sunday they handled host Northeastern 3-0.

"Old Dominion was a tough game for both teams," said Northeastern coach Sheryl Murtagh. "They were a bit overwhelming for us as they were for UMass."

Today at Totman Field (3 p.m.), Northeastern (6-3) faces UMass (6-2). Both teams have a lot to lose, both in their minds and in the rankings. The Huskies are ranked No. 1 in New England and No. 5 in the nation; UMass enters as No. 2 in New England and No. 10 in the nation.

Both teams need a win for their psyche. The Minutewomen have been working hard in practice, trying to correct this weekend's mistakes. UMass coach Pam Hixon has been preaching discipline and running her team ragged.

NU has opted for the more tactical approach by preparing to play a game on a foreign surface: grass.

"We're getting on grass and practicing grass corners, which are different than turf corners," Murtagh said. "Playing the game on grass gives UMass a bit of an advantage, just like when they come to Northeastern we have the advantage."

The Huskies have one of the toughest schedules in Div. 1 field hockey. Already this season, NU has faced the top three teams in the country, and 15th ranked Harvard.

Kelly Wilk leads the team with 15 goals and three assists. Jennifer Deo has six goals and six assists, while Katherine Pryde has two goals and eight assists.

Murtagh was undecided on who would start in goal for today's game. Kathy Farley and Brenda Mitchell have split the goaltenders duty thus far. Farley has appeared in four games with a 1.00 goals-against average and two shutouts, while Mitchell boasts a 1.83 GAA in six games.

NCAA Rankings: 1. North Carolina 2. Old Dominion 3. Northwestern and Penn State 5. Northeastern 6. Iowa 7. Virginia 8. Maryland 9. Temple 10. UMass

Atlantic 10 Notes: Rutgers is in first place in the A-10, at 2-1. UMass and Temple are second at 1-0. Rhode Island is 1-2. Penn State has yet to play a conference game, and St. Joseph's is 0-2.

Scoring Leaders: Jane Catanzaro leads all scorers with 30 goals. Kristen Winters from Penn State is second with 11 goals and five assists. Chelle Frates also from PSU is third with seven goals and eight assists. Mara Frattasio and Beth Thornton are tied for ninth with six points each.

Michele Brennan, the goalie for Penn State, was named Atlantic 10 Player-of-the-Week. On the season Brennan has posted six shutouts and has a 0.45 GAA. For the week, Brennan notched three shutouts.

Germany reunifies

Official merging meets with mixed reactions

BERLIN (AP)— Germany's president marked the historic unification today of his mighty new country by promising Germans will work for world peace and never forget the victims of the nation's Nazi past.

Random violence in nearly a dozen cities marred the unification celebrations overnight. And about 15,000 leftists protesting the merger rallied this afternoon in Berlin's working-class district of Kreuaberg, and numerous shouting matches with police broke out.

At a formal state ceremony in the Berlin Philharmonic Hall, President Richard von Weizsaecker said: "The Nazi terror and the war it caused inflicted untold serious injustice and suffering on almost all of Europe and on us. We continuously recall the victims."

"No one among us will forget that there never would have been a separation without the war started by Germany under Hitler," von Weizsaeker told several hundred invited guests.

The 70-year-old head of state said Germany wants to "serve world peace in a united Europe."

Eleven months after the Berlin Wall fell in a peaceful revolt that cast aside Communist East German overlords, the city that symbolized the Cold War division of Europe rejoiced. It was again the capital of a united Germany.

At midnight Tuesday, before the battle-scarred Reichstage, an estimated one million Germans from all walks of life joined in an emotional chorus of the national anthem to usher in the birth of their nations.

In Berlin, police said abut 50 people were arrested for fighting or other infractions overnight. A few people were injured when they fell to the ground in the crowd, police said, adding that three warning shots from an officer prevented those who fell from being trampled.

Also today, German leaders celebrated unification at solemn services in the ornate Marienkirche, a Lutheran church, in the former East Berlin.

Among those attending were the first chancellor of the new nation, Helmut Khol, former East German Prime Minister Lothar de Maziere von Weizsaecker and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

In his sermon, Lutheran Bishop Johannes Hempel told the hundreds of Germans from East and West to "accept each other the way God has accepted you, in praise of the Lord."

Germans in a united nation must deal with one another with a sense of "inner freedom, tust and fairness," he said.

Many consider the nation of 78 million people to have supplanted the Soviet Union as a superpower, and there is some anxiety among neighbors with memories of Nazi aggression.

Germany's imperialist past was recalled by the Reichstage, the old parliament building heavily damaged in the last days of World War II.

On Thursday, it will again be host to German lawmakers.

Expert lectures on arms

By PRATIP DASTIDAR

Janne Nolan, an expert on weapons proliferation from the Washington D.C. based Brookings Institute delivered a lecture entitled "New Weapons of Mass Destruction" at UMass last night.

Nolan's talk focused on the proliferation of ballistic missile technology among Third World nations, and she expressed concern that this new development could have potentially destabilizing effects on world peace.

She cited Brazil, India, North Korea, South Korea, Israel, South Africa and Iraq as examples of nations that have acquired or are in the process of acquiring ballistic missile technology.

"Unfortunately it is the case that countries believe it is their sovereign right to build such weapons," she said.

Nolan described how a 1987 agreement between a group of industrial nations helped to curb a joint Argentine-Egypt-Iraq effort to extend the capabilities of the Condor missile.

"Stringent export controls and enforcement by suppliers is essential," she said. "In the long run Third World states must feel that it [missile proliferation] reduces security."

Nolan felt that the current crisis involving Iraq had raised awareness among industrial powers about the perceived threat to global security posed by missile proliferation in the Third World. She described Iraq's missile capability as relatively modest, and said there was no hard evidence that chemical warheads could be delivered by Iraqi SCUD B missiles.

"Iraq has about 36 launchers, each of which launch 3 warheads. Iraq is believed to have between 200 to 600 missiles. 300 missiles were delivered [by Iraq] during the last phase of the Iran-Iraq war."

She mentioned India and Israel as nations likely to soon acquire long range missile capability. "India's space program is two-thirds military and is intended to develop a long-range force to counter China."

Nolan felt that communication between Third World nations must be encouraged so as to alleviate arms races, and cited the agreement between India and Pakistan not to attack each other's nuclear installations as an example of this approach.

Galligan lead investigated

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Investigators are looking into a possible connection between a woman who was almost abducted Sept. 16 in Belchertown and the Dec. 18, 1989 slaying of University of Massachusetts student Sharon Galligan.

The woman, who was threatened with a knife but was not hurt, told state police that her assailant resembled a composite sketch of Galligan's slayer. She added that the man asked her, "Are you a UMass student?"

The woman is not a UMass student. State Police Lt. Edward Harrington, who is investigating the case, said the incident is one of many which his office is looking into in connection with the Galligan case. He said he has found no definite link.

He added that investigators are "very actively" working on the case, and are still receiving phone calls from the public. They have narrowed the pool of suspects to about 25 people.

In light of the controversy surrounding the New England Patriots, the University of Massachusetts football team will enforce an age-old policy that states no one, whether press or family, will be allowed in the stadium locker room, according to head coach Jim Reid.

"Nobody will go into the locker room," Reid said. "It's in the playbook. The press should be able to get the news out and conduct interviews in the press room."

Souter to be sworn in next week

WASHINGTON (AP)— David Souter of New Hampshire will take his oath next week as a Supreme Court justice, with the nation watching how he'll vote on abortion and other contentious social issues.

The Senate voted 90-9 Tuesday to confirm Souter, 51, as the 105th member of the high court. The Court immediately announced that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist will swear in Souter next Tuesday morning, just before the Supreme Court begins hearing the second week of arguments in its 1990-91 term.

The first major case Souter will hear concerns a sex-bias dispute. At issue is whether employers may exclude all women of childbearing age from some hazardous jobs, and the Court's decision could affect millions of women.

Issues of sex discrimination, race discrimination and especially abortion rights were at the core of opposition to Souter within and outside the Senate.

The handful who voted against him and many voting for the nomination worried aloud that he would side with the Court's conservatives and overrule Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion.

To many Democrats who voted for Souter, his record on these social issues was troubling but his testimony encouraging, even though he refused to be pinned down, especially on the politically hot abortion decision.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said there appeared to be "two Judge Souters."

"The Judge Souter who testified before our committee did not seem locked to the past," and that was the one he was voting for Kohl said. But the National Abortion Rights Action League said the Senate "made a dangerous leap of faith" that could lead to the defeat of abortion rights and a return to "back-alley abortions."

"I have been given much and much will be expected of me in return, and I will make that return to you and I will make it in the fullest measure that I can," he said

Abilities Unlimited focuses on accessibility

By MARC ELLIOT
Collegian Correspondent

For three hours yesterday and Tuesday several University staff and student leaders confined themselves to wheelchairs in a program organized by Abilities Unlimited, an organization of about a hundred disabled UMass students.

After picking up their wheelchairs at the Disability Services office in Whitmore, participants spent the next three hours trying to conduct their business as usual, but without their legs.

Participants in the program included Arthur Hilson, chief of the UMass police and director of Public Safety, Ted Mone, operation manager for the Orchard Hill/Central residential areas and Karen Renaud, president of the Pan Hellenic Council.

Throughout the three hours they had to avoid potholes and stairs and deal with crowded furniture, slow elevators and crumbling sidewalks and hills.

Jana Sorge, a junior pyschology major and president of Abilities Unlimited, said she has been able to get to most of the buildings where she has classes. Classified as a quadriplegic, Sorge uses her left foot to steer her powered wheelchair to classes.

"Most of the ones I've had to deal with so far are accessible," Sorge said, "but some of them aren't."

Some of the older academic buildings like Fernald Hall or Thayer are not accessible by wheelchair and may never be, due to the high cost of making them so, said Paul R. Appleby, director of Disablility Services.

"If the University did get some money to improve accessibility, there are other things that would be done first."

Many classes are moved by Disability Services to accommodate handicapped students, Appleby said.

"I had a discussion that was on the second floor of Dickinson. . ." said Sorge, "but the second floor isn't accessible because there isn't an elevator. So they had to move it to the first floor. But at the time there was all this construction, so they had dug up the area around it so there was no way to go up. So they had to move it again."

While many buildings are accessible by wheelchair, some of them are still difficult to move around in due to elevators with the buttons placed high up and hallways with too many dividing doors, Sorge said.

The number of hills at UMass is a lot of wear and tear on the wheelchairs and winter greatly complicates matters, she said.

"In the winter, things get pretty crazy because they don't shovel things as well as they should," Sorge said. "And a lot of times they'll shovel the snow into the curb cuts so you can't get off onto the road or across the street. So that can be highly annoying. There have been times that I've sat there waiting for someone to help me out of this puddle of ice that I can't get out of, but I manage pretty well."

Sorge said she thinks that she has gotten used to being in her wheelchair because she has been handicapped all of her life but added she can see how those who could walk at some time in the past might have trouble adjusting.

"I was born with cerebral palsy," said Sorge. "My parents didn't even know about it until I was a year old. I walked a little bit when I was younger, but not much. I'm not very coordinated."

A Disability Pride Day rally is to be held on the Boston Common this Saturday. Sorge and other members of Abilities Unlimited plan to attend.

Volunteer fair a success

By HEIDI BABINSKI
Collegian Correspondent

The Human Kindness Project and Volunteer Initiative Blending and Education Service hosted a successful Volunteer Fair yesterday, which included an array of local non-profit agencies hoping to recruit reliable student volunteers.

The action unfolded under a striped tent in the Northeast quad with a live DJ and free frozen yogurt from Bananarama to help liven the festivities.

The goal of the Human Kindness Project was to foster and channel knowledge of humane interests in the resident halls and within the community. The project is designed to identify enjoyable student volunteer positions. It works with various non-profit agencies in the area helping to abolish suffering, both locally and throughout the world.

"I'm looking for warm, community-type people to help assist with the elderly and physically handicapped, incorporating social, spiritual and intellectual areas of therapy. I signed up 20 people today." Laskey said.

Another agency present included Jessie's House, a shelter in Northampton. A dignified environment for up to 21 homeless people, it also serves as a resource to the entire community, providing emergency food, referral services and housing assistance.

James A. Fox, chief of Volunteer Service for the Veterans Administration in Northampton, was busy orienting students for "college companion" status. Some of these tasks include assisting Veteran patients with psychiatric disorders, substance abuse problems or Alzheimer's disease by helping with multiple rehabilitation, recreation and entertainment settings.

Other organizations included the Springfield Ronald McDonald House and the United Way.

Students from the UMass Housing Recycling Program also had a prosperous turnout, recruiting 24 volunteers. Cheryl Baldwin, coordinator of the program, is interested in getting students more involved in recycling, in learning the different aspects of recycling and "in educating others through these services as a means of saving the planet," Baldwin said.

Athletes extoll Church

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Editor's note — This is the fourth in a series of articles addressing the Boston Church of Christ.

"Think back to when you were young. Who was your hero?" asks Dave Mitchell. The group of 25 students smile and their answers range from "My older brother" to "The Six Million Dollar Man."

It was the ice-breaker question to an informal bible study two nights ago in Emerson residence hall, led by Mitchell and Skye Eddie. Both Eddie and Mitchell are on varsity sports teams at the University of Massachusetts. It has been a practice of the Boston Church of Christ to pursue high profile members of university and college communities.

Mitchell says he is a member of the BCC because they are the group of people who have best answered his questions about religion and life, but that he remains open to other possibilities. He says he reads the Bible and then figures out how it applies to his own life. He says the group contains much love and truth, and that he does have a mentor in the church, someone to whom he looks up and who offers advice to him.

James Polana, minister of the Springfield Church of Christ, and Mitchell play basketball and hang out together. "We're great friends, we do talk about things other than the Church. He offers me advice. Hindsight may be 20/20 but it helps to have someone who's been through stuff before you suggesting things."

Mitchell, a fullback for the UMass football team, said he is equally at home with his friends on the team and with those from the Church. "It's because we're striving to see the same things accomplished."

A member of the Church since November of his sophomore year in college, Mitchell — now in his fifth year — said he realizes it is easy to be stereotyped through involvement with the Church and that discouragement is something he is aware of.

He makes an analogy between the expectations of a team and those of the BCC. "A coach comes to your house and recruits you. They are recruited and the coaches expect them to perform. The coaches love their players. The love only becomes deeper. It may not be the same intensity, but there is no love lost and no communication lost. The Church isn't perfect, and neither am I."

PSRU adjusts to change

By MELAINE JANISCH
Collegian Correspondent

The People for a Socially Responsible University have undergone some noticeable changes lately, due to a series of conflicts with the Student Activities Office, according to an organizer.

The PSRU was working for the Radical Student Union, but, according to PSRU member Randy Viscio, they were being harassed the last two semesters for being there.

"We were informed that we cannot work out of there because we were not a legal student group," he said.

Having always answered the phone as RSU/PSRU, the PSRU was told by the Student Activities that that was unacceptable, Viscio said.

The Student Activities Office also would not allow PSRU advertisements to be placed in the "People's Forum," he added.

As a result of the conflicts, Viscio said the PSRU moved their office off campus. The new office is located at the Carriage Shops in downtown Amherst.

The new office was made possible by a $3,000 grant from the North Shore Unitarian Veatch Foundation of New Jersey, he said.

The PSRU currently has four chapters: UMass, Amherst College, Hampshire College and a recently opened chapter at Mount Holyoke College. There will be a second PSRU chapter at Hampshire College to officially register as a student organization and receive Student Activities funding.

The PSRU's actions at UMass are aimed at stopping the military research at the school, which is tied to the Department of Defense. It will also be involved in several upcoming actions being endorsed by the National Student Movement.

There will be petition tables in downtown Amherst, which the PSRU plans to keep running until the United States pulls out of the Persian Gulf. They are also organizing stepped-up student protests regarding U.S. troop deployments to the Middle East.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Boot ROTC from campus

In view of the the United States military services ban against homosexuals, and the execution of this policy in UMass ROTC programs — namely discrimination against openly gay, lesbian and bisexual students requesting military scholarships, physical and technical training — the Collegian feels that the ROTC should be banned from the University until the policy is eliminated.

Because of this unfair treatment, the Collegian feels the faculty and administration should seriously reconsider the role of ROTC on campus and their practices as well as issue an apology to the gay, lesbian and bisexual community.

Two separate studies, initiated by the Pentagon to investigate the reliability and performance of homosexuals in the military, concluded that "there was no evidence that [gays, lesbians and bisexuals] disrupted the armed forces." These studies also praised their performance and urged their retention.

The Pentagon initially attempted to suppress these studies and upon their release to the press were dismissed as inconclusive.

Currently, the Military Studies Committee within the Faculty Senate is investigating whether or not the ROTC's policy conflicts with the University non-discriminatory policy or the Massachusetts Gay Civil Rights Law and related statutes. When this investigative report is done, the Faculty Senate will make appropriate recommendations for action.

UMass ROTC prevents over 2,000 students from taking advantage of its scholarships and special training programs; this is clearly an issue of academic discrimination. We urge that the Faculty Senate treats it as such and upholds the mission of this University.

Bigotry on several sides of issue

On Sept. 24, the Collegian printed a political cartoon which compared Iraq's keeping of western hostages with other "primitive shields," like those born by Goths, Huns and Mongols.

The Boston Globe several weeks ago printed a cartoon which featured a caricature of Saddam Hussein as a caveman. The U.S. media and government are obsessed with making Iraq into a nation of missing links, brutishly grunting at the rest of the world.

The idea is if the U.S. and the world consider the Gulf situation on a superficial level, they won't ask questions, like "What is he saying about the Arab world being exploited for oil?" or "How many Arab governments are so heavily influenced by Western money that they sell out the people they represent?"

Arab peoples have evolved just as far as Westerners. Their culture is rich and beautiful, and they have legitimate concerns about how their lands are being used.

On Sept. 6, the Collegian printed a column by Minu Sebastian equally bigoted. It described the people of the U.S. as "selfish, self-centered imbeciles who only understand violence."

She also claims that Iraq has "reclaimed what is rightfully theirs," and ignores the well-known brutality of Hussein, who is consistently cited by Amnesty International and other human rights groups as a murderous tyrant.

Both pieces distort the facts. Ignoring truth in favor of nationalistic bigotry reduces human life to something much less real, which is what war is about.

Violence must end

While digging through the back pages of last Sunday's paper, I came across a headline "Black teens in clashes killed by 'necklace'." The article was about this weekend's problems in South Africa, stating 800 people have died since August due to infighting among rival Black factions.

What confuses me about South Africa is that I have a hard time keeping straight who the "bad guys" are. Is it the oppressive government that won't give Blacks any rights or is it the Blacks slaughtering each other in the streets, fighting for power?

Three Black youths, ages 16 to 19, were killed by another much larger group of Blacks while walking down the street. They were killed by a 'necklace' — this is when a tire is soaked in diesel (which is used because it sticks to the skin) and put around a person's neck and lit on fire. What kind of person would do something like that to another human being?

The Whites have to give up Apartheid, but now would not be the best time to do it. The Blacks in South Africa have to get organized before they are given self-rule. As long as the Black vs. Black violence continues, they are going to get nowhere.

So, for now, we should hold off on the "Free South Africa" message we're sending to the White government. We should send a message to South African Blacks to stop the violence and organize.

Stop the violence so South Africa can be free!

Fans should benefit from Sox's victory

In this day and age, when the only reason to excel in professional sports is to add another million to a contract or to gain endorsements and one's picture on everything from posters to candy bars, one would like to think that a team like the Red Sox, who have been in Fenway for nearly 90 years, would have enough dignity left to give up a little cash for the people who love them the most — the fans.

Erik Sussbauer

Wrong. The Red Sox brass showed this weekend that they are money grubbing scum just like the rest. While the whole nation watched Tom Brunansky and Roger Clemens lead Boston to perhaps the biggest victory of the season last Saturday, those diehard fans within 75 miles of the Fenway sat at home watching the Padres and the Reds — a game that had no bearing on life in Boston.

This is due to the fact that the Red Sox, although they are receiving around $10 million from CBS this season, refused their request to lift the blackout of the game — reason being to protect NESN's precious 370,000 subscribers.

Give me a break. When it comes to Boston's sports fans, we stick together.

Besides showing no respect to the fans, they also didn't show much respect to a company who is paying for a much larger chunk of the Red Sox payroll than the NESN contract could ever dream of. I can't wait to hear how negative CBS is to the Red Sox if and when they make the playoffs.

But wait! There's even more to come from under their tightly fitted dunce caps. Those parsimonious idiots were looking for that extra couple of bucks in the park itself. Those of us who were lucky enough to be at Fenway this weekend had the distinct opportunity to buy Blue Jays merchandise in the bleachers.

Now let's see what we have here — two teams battling for the title, hometown fans who weren't even in their grandfather's balls last time the Red Sox won the championship and plenty of beer. Do they need any more incentive to pound on Blue Jays fans?

Not according to the Red Sox marketing executives. They thought it would be neat to give the Canadian fans hats and pennants so they can be found more easily.

Think for a moment what would happen if UMass decided to sell Temple hats in the Cage. The people selling the stuff wouldn't get out alive, never mind the Philadelphians who bought it.

But that's not even the point. The Red Sox need all the help they can get, dedication and support from the fans being most important. Giving the opposing team's fans any help doesn't benefit the cause. If they have the nerve to show up, let 'em go to the souvenir shop. At least it will keep them out of the park.

If the Red Sox manage to pull out a pennant or World Series victory this season, it certainly won't be because of management. If there is success, the fans should be reimbursed for the last 72 years of tireless support with lower ticket prices next season. They are the ones who deserve it — they're the ones who care.

Workers warn of Question 3's impact

To our fellow Massachusetts citizens:

As a group of average workers, who happen to be state employees, we would like to bring certain facts to your attention.

In common with all citizens of this state, our money does not stretch as far as it did two years ago. July 1988 was our last pay increase. Actually, a decrease occurred in June 1990 with an increase in health coverage costs.

For years, we as a group have been misjudged as being lazy, non-productive welfare workers. This is not true for the majority of state workers. Most of us are the nuts and bolts that keep the University of Massachusetts at Amherst clean, maintained and functional.

We also have heating, medical and housing, plus families to feed and clothe in common with all of you. Without our jobs we will become welfare recipients.

Please get all the facts and consider carefully the short and long term effects of your November vote.

Distorted views of Northern Ireland perpetuate conflict

Northern Ireland. To many, the name conjures up images of mad bombers and gunmen randomly attacking defenseless mothers and children, while upright British squaddies vainly struggle to restore peace.

Jim Dee

This distorted image of the North of Ireland has served Britain well, cloaking its role in creating and perpetuating the conflict. Continued distortions have absolved Britain from the responsibility of entering into peace negotiations with the IRA, while hiding from the world the brutal realities of its continued colonial occupation of Ireland.

Among those realities is the fact that in the past 20 years over 700,000 homes have been searched, in an area with a population of only 1.5 million people. The searches punish the working-class nationalist population, who refuse to accept the continuation of British rule.

One ex-British soldier stated in the July 1990 issue of the London-based journal Troops Out, "The official line is that they're only carried out when there is suspicion of an arms dump, for example. That's a lie. It's not selective, it's just part of the overall intimidation."

The intimidation doesn't stop there. If one is active in left-wing politics, displaying any hint of opposition to British rule, one is likely to be interrogated as a potential terrorist. During these "interrogations" detainees are frequently beaten and tortured.

The British army's most infamous beatings were handed out in 1971, following the introduction of indefinite internment without trial — introduced exclusively against the nationalist population. During internment, thousands of labor leaders, community leaders and students activists were subjected to sensory deprivation, electric shock, and denied food and sleep.

Amnesty International and the European Commission on Human Rights have repeatedly condemned Britain for its use of torture in Northern Ireland. Today the most severe beatings are carried out in the Castlereah RUC compund in East Belfast.

To counter its image abroad, in the mid-70s Britain embarked upon a campaign of disinformation against the IRA, falsely portraying the guerrillas' actions as indiscriminate and bloodthirsty. Earlier this year a former British Intelligence officer, Colin Wallace, produced documents which proved the existence of such a covert campaign named Clockwork Orange. These documents show actions were aimed not just against the IRA, but also against politicians in Britain and Northern Ireland who favored peace negotiations with the IRA.

Clockwork Orange is but one example of the broader "dirty tricks" campaign which has been far more sinister. Contrary to British propaganda, the IRA consistently precedes bombings with telephoned warnings to security forces as well as to independent monitoring agencies in order to avoid civilian casualties. It has been verified that on several occasions the British have failed to pass on the warnings to target areas. The result has been civilian deaths and propaganda victories for the British.

Perhaps the most successful British propaganda victory has been in perpetuating the myth that it wants nothing more than to withdraw from Ireland. Unfortunately, there would be a bloodbath if the British suddenly left. However, no one is calling for the British to leave suddenly.

Sinn Fein and others have proposed a phased withdrawal over five years, during which time British economic assistance could supplant its massive military outlays in Northern Ireland, and serious negotiations on the structure of a united Ireland could begin without loyalists relying on the British army trump card.

In the interim period it is hoped that the British could make an effort to disarm loyalist death squads. Now, they do quite the opposite. In 1988, the British government was helping fund a factory which produced machine guns for loyalist death squads. In 1989, it was discovered that for years British soldiers have been passing loyalists the names and addresses of republican sympathizers — including lawyers and community activists, many of whom have been subsequently executed by loyalists.

News from Northern Ireland is scarce. We seldom hear of the summary executions of IRA operatives by the British army — actions of war, despite the fact the British deny republican prisoners POW status and refuse to enter peace negotiations. More voices need to be heard from Northern Ireland. Despite representing 35 percent of the nationalist electorate, Sinn Fein is strictly censored. Sadly, the inability of Sinn Fein to speak freely, or to elicit support abroad for their peace proposals, will only perpetuate the bloodshed.

Society devalues life

" . . Jack Caster . . Wes Cronk . . Roger Lyon. . ." Read over a loud speaker, the names of the deceased echo throughout the oversized gym and continue in a quilt connected with seams which stretch for 78 miles and memories which are infinite. The quilt weighs 13 tons and is so heavy it overwhelms one's heart. A person in front of me bows his head, shadowing tears from the rest who have come to see the AIDS Memorial Quilt. Sitting on the floor, streams flow down his cheeks as he tenderly touches the quilt.

Adam Stein

The sponsor is called The Names Project, yet for him it is not just a name, but perhaps a friend, or a parent, or a sibling. We may not be familiar with the victims, yet we really are. They are our neighbors, teachers, veterans, nurses, a U.S. Congressman, carpenters, engineers and an Olympic Athlete.

In May 1990, they totalled 80,791 dead with 132,510 others positively diagnosed. They too will die, as there is no cure. AIDS, sadly enough, is a disease that has been placed on the scale on which society weighs people's worth. And the worth of homosexuals is considered less than the worth of others.

It is a stigmatized illness which affects sections of society who are seen as less desirable, and thus people just don't care. While thousands had already died, it was not seriously addressed by our government until 1986, six years after the discovery of the disease, when Ronald Reagan asked the Surgeon General to write a report on the AIDS epidemic. "By the time President Reagan delivered his first speech about AIDS, 36,058 people had been diagnosed with the disease; 20,849 had died (And The Band Played On, Randy Shiltz)."

There is an inconsistent response to disasters which affect the White heterosexual communities as opposed to those felt outside of the mainstream. The most popular example was the massive manhunt launched by Mayor Flynn of Boston against the supposed African-American murderer of Charles Stuart's wife, when murders occurring in the same area against non-Whites are investigated with much less vigor.

Another example of society's valuing some lives more than others was the attention given to the Tylenol scare. When cyanide was discovered in the capsules the New York Times wrote a story on the scare everyday for that October (1982) and produced 23 pieces in the two months after that (Shiltz)."

However, by Oct. 5, 260 people had died of AIDS, with another 374 infected, yet the The New York Times had written only three stories about the epidemic in 1981 and three more stories in all of 1982 (Shiltz)."

Society's weighing of deaths within the mainstream as more important than the deaths of gays was not only evident in the unequal media coverage of AIDS, but also in government funding of the disease. In 1976 a disease broke out among a group of married White American Legion conventioners in Philadelphia. The epidemic, which claimed far fewer lives than AIDS, became known as Legionnaire's Disease and was being researched by the National Institutes of Health (NIH) at the same time as AIDS. NIH Legionairre's spending in 1982 was $34,841 per death as opposed to the $3,225 spent per AIDS death (Shiltz). The main difference between the victims was their sexual orientation.

It is this which the AIDS Memorial Quilt tries to convey and, as the demographics of AIDS victims continue to change and more heterosexuals are woven into the panels of the quilt, it will be this we must remember: 26 percent of those with AIDS received the virus through heterosexual transmission or IV drug use.

Democratic Party blues

What is happening to the Democratic Party? It seems lately it has been more interested in getting re-elected than in its agenda.

A recent mailer from the Democratic National Committee stated the Dem's long standing commitment to issues like education, the environment, AIDS research, fighting the drug war in our cities and protecting women's rights and civil rights.

Jason Kofman

However, over the past nine months, national Democratic leaders have certainly not produced any results to write home about.

Since G.H.W. Bush arrived in the Oval Office, Democratic leadership has supported bills on voter motor registration, minimum wage increases and decreasing contra aid.

In all three instances, they lost even with a majority in the House and Senate. Why the apathy? It may be the absence of a strong national leader. The GOP has people like Bush, Bob Dole, Newt Gingrich, all spouting the same message. The Dems have Tom Foley, George Mitchell and Dick Gephardt trying to appease the American voter by trying to sound like the administration.

In rare instances when Dems have loudly and openly called for reform, they were either smothered by the GOP with re-election threats (Gephardt challenging Bush ad getting lambasted by GOP chief Lee Atwater) or quieted down by their own party (Dan Moynihan and Rostenkowski's various tax plans earlier this year).

The problem may be the Party has too many leaders representing too many factions, failing to delineate a unified party message.

The party that has long represented change and progress has recently been guilty of stagnation and apathy. Aside from the recent defeat of Bush's quest to lower capital gains taxes, Democrats have lately been trying just to maneuver themselves into a favorable position to catch some of the spotlight.

Where was the opposition last month to Bush sending thousands of troops to the Middle East and telling Congress that hostilities were not imminent? There was no admonition from the Democrats until two weeks ago, after thousands of troops had been positioned and billions of dollars spent in a peace-keeping capacity.

It seems that the progressive voice and leadership that once characterized the Democratic Party is out to lunch. There are very few Democrats in Congress who are considered liberal Democrats and even a smaller percentage in the Senate.

This political complacency has twice allowed Republican administrations to gut long-standing Democratic gains in the last 20 years. The Nixon administration was allowed to dismantle gains made by FDR's New Deal and the Reaganites were allowed to roll back many of the gains made during LBJ's Great Society.

Today's Democratic Party seems like a party with too many ideological balls in the air, that really needs to get its identity straight.

With many progressive Democrats running for office in November like Diane Feinstein, Ann Richards and Harvey Gatt, the Party may be showing signs of life. Whatever the case, it must get its act together to survive the November elections and then set its sights on the White House in '92.

Without a unified party message, we can expect more of less from the once mighty Democratic Party.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Kevin Mitchell: Up front and soon to be upcoming

By DAWN I. PIERCE
Collegian Staff

Kevin Mitchell

Originally from Hanson, Mass. and a graduate of Cardinal Spellman High School, Kevin Mitchell began to implement his ideas of achieving a career in the music industry upon his acceptance to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in 1986.

Mitchell was accepted into the Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration Program, declaring a double major of Urban Communications and African American History.

Many students within the Black community here in the Pioneer Valley recognize the Kevin Mitchell as "DJ Kevy Kev," the man who has lit up the airwaves each Saturday night from 9 p.m. to 12 a.m. on the University radio station, 91.1 WMUA, for the past three and a half years.

Whether Mitchell is spinning the ever-popular house, rap and urban contemporary music on the radio's "Kevy Kev Show," or freelancing as a disc jockey at social functions, Mitchell continues to motivate the Pioneer Valley to "move your body" to the music.

However, it need not be assumed that Mitchell's pursuance to excel academically and careerwise ceases at the turntables.

Mitchell's previous involvements here at UMass include being Program Director for WMUA, student senator for the Student Government Association, member of the Third World Caucus, member of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity and founder of Kappa Alpha Psi's Nu Tau chapter in March of 1989.

During the summer of 1989, Mitchell was also a Productions Assistant intern at Urban Update, a minority news program on the CBS television network channel WNEV-TV in Boston.

Mitchell's current activities at UMass include being Vice President of the Nu Tau chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi, specializing in communications and social planning for the chapter. Mitchell is also Promotions Manager for the Union Program Council (UPC), College Marketing Representative for CBS Records and is a music review columnist for Nommo News.

Commenting on his numerous activities at the University, Mitchell said, "a lot of people have aspirations for careers and they're not using the proper channels that are available to them, for example, the registered student organizations. I believe it is important for the students to realize their involvement during college years will in time affect their future in their career fields."

As a victim of the Southwest riot that occurred at UMass a couple of years ago, Mitchell said he would like to be an example for other minority students to show that "despite the bad press and negative air of racism here at UMass, it is possible to succeed on a predominantly White campus."

Mitchell said his parents, Sam and Cathy Mitchell, have been the primary inspiration in his college career. He said "despite my shortcomings, there was always a positive light coming from home. My parents were always there for me and encouraged me to make the best of everything."

Mitchell also credits Rick Townes, associate dean of Student Affairs, for providing him with positive academic guidance and assistance since his freshman year. He said his fraternity brothers, David Walker and Duane Warren, both former presidents of Kappa Alpha Psi, and Nadie Pierre taught him discipline and respect during his orientation at Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Incorporated.

Mitchell said that courses he has taken previously in the Afro-American Studies department have contributed to his positive outlook. He said " the courses have enriched my outlook on life. They gave me extensive knowledge of my African-American roots. I believe it is important for Black students to take advantage of the exceptional Afro-American Studies department that we have."

Presently, Mitchell is working on establishing a record club for students here at UMass who want to learn more about the operations and hands-on training of a record label. Mitchell said there needs to be a greater concentration of Blacks getting involved in the sports and entertainment industries from a management perspective. He believes many Blacks take part as athletes and entertainers, but do not properly receive the acknowledgement in management positions.

Speaking of his experience working for CBS Records, Mitchell said "the skills I have learned from CBS Records have been extremely valuable. They gave me a head start in an industry where it is virtually impossible to get started." Mitchell said he received some of his training and inspiration to get involved in radio and music from former disc jockeys and members of the Black Mass Communications Project (BMCP), Ronald "Ruff" Furr and "Daddy" Neil Grant.

One of Mitchell's priorities is to be a positive role model for his peers and contribute back to his community. He said "I want people to say that I was out there for the community, that I looked out for my people and tried to make a difference." This, he said, is why he has extended his skills and knowledge in training others to get involved, including other members of BMCP such as Collette Greinstein, Peter Ribeiro and Kenley Ovas.

Mitchell anticipates attending Richmond College in London for the spring semester of 1991. There he will be working as a CBS Records intern in the United Kingdom. Mitchell expects to receive his Bachelor's of Arts degree in May of 1991.

After graduation, career plans include working for CBS Records in marketing and promotions. Mitchell said his goals are to own a record label with international distribution and an urban communications consulting firm specializing in consulting with cable, broadcasting, network television and advertising agencies.

Dr. Joy James: On profile

By RAMANI P. SRIPADA
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Joy James is an assistant professor in the Women's Studies department here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. She is teaching two courses this fall: "African-American Women in the 20th Century Political Movements" and "Feminist/Womanist Theory."

Dr. James received her undergraduate education at St. Mary's University in Texas. Her post doctorate work was done in liberation theology at Union Theological Seminary. Her doctorate work was in political theory. She has been a visiting scholar at Miami University in Ohio. Dr. James previously taught at a seminary in New York.

While in Miami, Dr. James was involved with a coalition of diverse students doing anti-racist, anti-Klan work. The Ku Klux Klan was going to march and the students wanted to protest. From this experience, Dr. James said she learned more about social relationships, courage, compassion and militancy, especially amongst the Black women who were leading the protest.

Dr. James has also been involved in work concerning political prisoners here in the United States and on anti-violence against women campaigns.

Currently, Dr. James is working on a political biography of Ella Baker. Her issues of concern are on the state's racial policies and their effects on women and genocidal policies. She said she would also like to do an analysis around "womanhood" and work for liberation.

Dr. James hopes to connect with Black women scholars. She would like to form a link between courses and program development, and how it relates to political thinking and activism. James said she wants to see Black women take their "space," and speak out. She thinks students should give more input into programming and share their ideas. She said that she has a lot to learn and give in such exchanges. James said she would like to see more Black men enrolled in her courses as well as more students in general of cultural diversity.

You can't trust what U read

Claim: When racial tensions arise, does the media exhibit favoritism?

The American media is a strange operating device. In the past year I have been witness to two statements made by "political figures," one White, one Black, both of which do damage to a race of people.

Reginald Perry

The American media system is set up so that White persons in positions of power can say virtually anything they want, to anyone they want and get away with it. On the other hand, when the Black man takes center stage and attempts to do the same thing, he is crucified!

Starting things off, we have gubernatorial candidate John Silber who stated abruptly that the reason why he wouldn't give a speech in areas A and B (these areas may be regarded as high crime areas to some) in Boston is that "I will tell you something about that area. There is no point in my making a speech on crime control to a group of drug addicts."

The media crawled all over that asinine remark to a degree, but they didn't assassinate him like they have done to others in the past. A large part of it is that those who have been offended by such ignorance have a job, which is to make sure that what has been stated doesn't go unheard, in other words cause a ruckus.

When I say assassinate, I mean to degrade with the intention of making a mockery of that individual or group. That's the fate suffered by Richard (Professor Griff) Griffin and Public Enemy.

Griff stated in the May 22 issue of the Washington Times that "The Jews are responsible for the majority of the wickedness that goes on across the globe, including what's going on in South Africa." Professor Griff also added that Jews have a history of killing Black men, a practice continuing today in South Africa, where Jews are financing AIDS experiments on Black people.

I followed this disaster closely and the media had a field day on my group. Countless articles were written, the group appeared on MTV announcing a breakup and various other TV appearances, which brings me to a point made by Spike Lee in the September 1989 issue of American Film Magazine.

"Blacks can't ever be racist themselves because they don't have the political power to institute racist laws. When Blacks call Whites names, that's prejudice. Racism is where you put laws into effect, structures that affect you socially." Spike Lee poses the question "What can Black people do to harm Jewish people as a people?"

As for owning up to what was said, Griff admits that what he said was wrong, and an apology was offered to the Jewish community by Chuck D., lead vocal for Public Enemy, because the comment is more or less on the record of the group, and not really on Griff's.

As for our foul-mouthed gubernatorial candidate Mr. Silber, he points the finger at the media for misrepresenting what he said. Why can't this "man" own up to what spewed out of his mouth? He refuses to make an apology to those whom he offended.

Once again our great media goes "blind" when something is owed to persons of color. In reference to Public Enemy, I had to sit and watch Chuck D. and the crew take a media "lashing."

What we have here is a razor sharp but at the same time dull as hell double-edged sword. Those with political power and influence can say whatever they want to whomever they want, however they want and go virtually untouched by the media.

But when the shoe is on the foot of the Black man, he can't speak his mind, or the result of his words are encoded as being racist or prejudice. In other words the Black man is to remain the "massa's humble slave."

I'll ask you one more time, does the media play favorites?

Revealing the jazzy side of drummer Bill Bruford

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Drummer Bill Bruford and his band Earthworks are coming to the Iron Horse next Monday at 7 p.m. What's Bruford, a member of the name-like-a-law-firm rock supergroup Anderson Bruford Wakeman Howe (ABWH), doing in this column? The fact is that Bruford leads a dual musical life these days. Between gigs in stadiums full of teenyboppers and old Yes fans, he plays in clubs with a band of hot young jazz players from England.

Bruford was one of the very few musicians who came out of the 70s art-rock scene with his integrity intact. He was in bands such as Yes and King Crimson that came to be written off as "corporate," but he was only involved with them during their early, truly creative stages. He was also involved with several obscure, wonderfully experimental bands, such as Gong and National Health. He flirted with jazzier structures in his own late-70s band, which included guitar wizard Allan Holdsworth and recorded the magnificent album Feels Good to Me.

Bruford resumed his jazzy predilections after King Crimson reformed and broke up yet again in the early 80s. After a brief partnership with Yes/Moody Blues keyboardist Patrick Moraz, he entered the realm of a large number of young players who were revitalizing the British jazz scene. He formed Earthworks around himself, saxophonist Iain Ballamy and horn/keyboard player Django Bates; the band has been together for five years and has released two albums. The latest, Dig?, was released last year on Caroline records.

The Earthworks concept centers around Bruford's MIDI electronic drums, which allow him to play melodies and chords.

"I wanted to be able to support two single-line instruments in order that chords could come from the drums, and that the drums would not be clogging up too much keyboard space," he explains. "I knew that would give us a kind of 'aerated' texture which wasn't heavy."

Although the band does use lots of electronics, their music is tied to the British jazz scene instead of to the standard notion of "fusion."

"Earthworks goes about making jazz-ish music in a different way from an L.A. fusion band. I feel that the kind of Britishness that we bring may have something to do with understatement, which is a classic British characteristic. We'd rather not make a great big fuss about attracting too much attention to ourselves in time-honored speed-metal-fusion style."

When asked to explain his involvement in both an experimentally-oriented jazz band and a stadium-rock supergroup, Bruford is quite pragmatic: "The rock audience doesn't know anything about Earthworks, and couldn't care less. I suppose I've been able to bring some fresher and more challenging music to one in a hundred of them. It's a very common thing for musicians to have a 'day job' and a 'night job,' a paying gig and one that you pay to play. ABWH is, in a way, a day gig, though I would take no gig that I couldn't enjoy on some kind of strong musical basis."

He also sees nothing wrong in using his name and reputation to promote Earthworks' music: "I would do whatever is necessary in order to try and get an audience to come and hear us," he says. "If you want me to take my trousers down, I'll probably do that as well."

But, he is quick to emphasize, "I won't alter the music."

Cocteau Twins' new LP is truly heavenly

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Cocteau Twins
Heaven or Las Vegas
4AD

About eight or nine years ago, a friend visiting from England brought me a present — several tapes of "new" bands that were the independent sensations of the time. One of them was by this dinky and mysterious band called the Cocteau Twins, and the title of the album was Garlands.

I instantly fell in love with it, as well as the 4AD record label, which over the years has put out some of the best music known to the human ear. Seven albums later, the Cocteaus have put out Heaven or Las Vegas — not a masterpiece, but certainly a gem in its own right.

Review

1988's Blue Bell Knoll finally caught the attention of new listeners as it was their first major label release. And this album is destined to reach an even larger audience. The single "Iceblink Link" (the band is notorious for finding strange titles for songs) has even been spotted on the upper end of the dial in the middle of the afternoon.

Eight years ago if someone told me these guys would get commercial airplay, I would have laughed. But the single has all of the right ingredients mandatory for a pop song. And although it is slightly conventional, it's evident that they still refuse to make the complete crossover.

"Fotzepoletic" is another beautiful song that would be great during a romantic interlude (more people have sex to the Cocteaus than any other artist). And other cuts like "I Wear Your Ring" and "Pitch The Baby" prove they are creative and will continue to be on the cutting edge of new and exciting music.

If you listen carefully, there are occasional lyrics on each cut — decipherable lyrics, which are something they've almost never done before. Liz Fraser's voice has always played the role of a third element, while Simon Raymond and Robin Guthrie came up with new and interesting ways to get some beauty from their instruments. This is especially apparent on "Wolf in the Breast" and "Road River and Rail."

Fraser and Guthrie recently had a child, and the content of the songs glorify that. They're obviously obsessed with their new addition. "Fifty Fifty Clown" and "Pitch the Baby" make it obvious they are proud parents.

All in all this is a lovely record. So full of charm and soul that it's irresistible. In fact, I have only one complaint. "Frou Frou Foxes in Midsummer Fires" tries too hard to be as pretty as possible. Had this track not been on the album I would have certainly given it a nine. But instead I'll give them a very well deserved eight.

By the way, they'll be touring in October. Let's persuade the Union Program Council to have them grace our campus with their presence.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Discipline and continuity are vital now. You will accomplish more by not relying on outside help. Be supportive of your mate or partner. Let others know exactly what is expected of them.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Be careful not to alienate your work associates today. Do not let petty irritations escalate into major blow-ups. Project humility and you will encourage someone to give you valuable tips.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) A change in personnel may come as a surprise. Be sure to display plenty of team spirit. Focus on projects you can handle on your own later in the day. Romance beckons from afar.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) You could hear something to your advantage this morning. New developments at the office work to your benefit. Play host to an unexpected visitor. Give offspring more supervision.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22) You may be doing some financial dickering today. Avoid pie-in-the-sky propositions. Socializing with people from different walks of life gives you valuable information. Use it wisely.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept. 22) Other people may try to throw their weight around. You do the opposite. Double-check business details to avoid making expensive mistakes. Your love life takes on extra space.

LIBRA (Sept 23-Oct 22) Keep your nose in the face of many irritations and avoid making snap decisions. Donate money or needed items to charity for a tax deduction. You finally learn the whereabouts of someone who has been elusive.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov 21) Heed the need to cooperate. Be willing to bend a little to avert a major hassle. Go the second mile for someone who is young or inexperienced. Pay bills before indulging in further spending.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov 22-Dec 21) Charity begins at home. Assume majority a new financial commitment. Fund-raising is part of the picture. Play your cards close to your chest. Romance might be especially exciting for singles.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan 19) Make certain you know which way the wind is blowing. Do your homework thoroughly before making a presentation to those in authority. A good evening for catching up on things at home.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Keep an eye on your long-term career goals. You have several attractive options. Hit the books this afternoon, digging for valuable facts and figures. Let family members know what you plan.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Your keen business sense could result in your winning a decision today! Try handling certain matters by mail instead of face to face. A newcomer offers a compliment.

By DAVE O'HARA
The Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Red Sox won the American League East championship for the third time in five yeasr last night, defeating Chicago White Sox 3-1 on the final night of the regular season behind the pitching of Mike Boddicker and Jeff Reardon

With ace Roger Clemens sent ahead to Toronto to rest for a possible divisional playoff on Thursday, the Red Sox made it academic as they won for the sixth time in the last eight games.

Boston's victory eliminated the Blue Jays, who lost to the Baltimore Orioles some five minutes later and finished two games out.

Chicago loaded the bases with one out on a single by Frank Thomas and a pair of walks. Boddicker retired Scott Fletcher on a pop to short but Ozzie Guillen singled to left.

Thomas scored on the hit but Dan Pasqua was thrown out at the plate on Greenwell's one-hop throw to catcher Tony Pena. It was Greenwell's 13th assists, all since June 28.

Reardon who made a remarkable comeback from back surgery on Aug. 4, replaced Boddicker at the start of the eighth. Carlton fisk, a one-time Red Sox hero, doubled with two out in the eighth but Thomas struck out.

The White Sox did not go quietly into the ninth. Sammy Sosa singled with two out in and Reardon hit Fletcher with a pitch. Guillen ripped a drive down the right-field line and Tom Brunansky made a sliding catch in the corner to end the game.

Instead of pitching in the SkyeDome on Thursday, Clemens (21-6) will face Dave Stewart (22-11) in the opener of the best-of-seven American League playoff Saturday night at fenway Park.

Northeastern upsets field hockey, 1-0

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The game appeared to freeze for 10 seconds. Everyone seemed to have their feet cemented in grass — all except for UMass forward Dawn Trumbauer and Northeastern goalie Brenda Mitchell.

Trumbauer stood five feet away from the goal, with only Mitchell to beat. One shot, pad save, another shot pad save, a third shot, glove save. Finally the ball trickled out of bounds.

Frustration, frustration and more frustration. That was the kind of day that UMass had yesterday at Totman Field, where they dropped a heart breaker to Northeastern 1-0.

Fifth-ranked Northeastern escaped Amherst yesterday with a win, but good teams find a way to win, and that's why the Huskies are the fifth-ranked team in the nation.

UMass stands tenth, soon to drop out of the elite class unless they find a way to win games like these. The irony of this game is that UMass played their best 70 minutes of the season, and lost.

"The goaltender played a great game," said NU coach Cheryl Murtagh. "They were pounding shots at us, and she held her own."

"We totally dominated, statistically it was 30-6 in shots, 16 penalty corners to two," Hixon said. "If we want to be considered a top team, this is the kind of game we need to have against Northeastern, but we have to finish it."

Northeastern sleepwalked through the first 55 minutes of the game. But with 15:35 to play in the second half, Katherine Pryde scored the only goal of the game on one of the few NU chances.

UMass goalie Philippa Scott sprawled to the ground to make the initial save, but the ball's momentum carried it over her body and Pryde, who hurdled Scott to get to the ball, tapped it into the open net. It was Pryde's third goal of the season.

One mental lapse by the UMass defense and the game was over. The defense had been outstanding up until the last two games. And even yesterday, they played a steady game, but not steady enough.

"We have not been able to finish all season," Hixon said. "Somebody needs to emerge as a leader to get the job done inside the circle."

"I wouldn't say, we didn't deserve to win, because our goalkeeper did play outstanding," Murtagh said. "I've been in games like this, and lost — so I'll take the win."

For Northeastern it was a game they had to have. Their only top victory came against Northwestern on opening day. Since then, the Huskies have faltered, losing games to North Carolina, Old Dominion, and a much lesser Harvard team. This win should keep them in the top five for another week or so, but don't be surprised if they drop a few spots by the end of the year.

"This is the type of defeat that's almost harder than getting smashed or blown away by a team that's better than you are," Hixon said. "I think for us it's very difficult to lose a game like this, and now we'll see what we're made of."

■ Olson case chronicled

of Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson by Patriots players has been splattered across front pages of news and sports sections for the past week.

Sept. 16 — Olson stayed late after the Pats won over the Indianapolis Colts, waiting for two players to finish showering. She needed the interviews for a feature story. Some players complained to club officials that she was around.

Sept. 17 — Before practice, Olson was seated, interviewing cornerback Maurice Hurst, when tight end Zeke Mowatt and other players approached her and were alleged to have made lewd comments, one offering his genitals to her face.

Sept. 20 — General manager Patrick Sullivan told reporters a problem of harassment involving a reporter and players had occurred, that the matter had been handled internally and that there would be no fines.

Initially, Olson said she wanted to handle the matter diplomatically and have no references made to her. The Boston Globe spoke to Olson and she agreed to the content of the piece for Friday's edition, including reference to her.

Acknowledging Olson's earlier request, the Herald chose not to publish an article on the subject, with the stipulation that the Pats apologize. Subsequently, Globe executive sports editor Don Skwar spoke to Herald sports editor Bob Sales and told him he would co-sign a complaint to the National Football League, if desired.

NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced he would appoint a special counsel to investigate the incident.

Sept. 22 — Owner Victor Kiam told a Herald reporter Kevin Mannix that Olson was the one at fault for the incident and he was quoted as saying, "I'm sure [the incident] looms large in Lisa's life, but I can't get excited about it. It's a flyspeck in the ocean." He also wrongly accused Olson of chasing a Bengals player into the shower area.

Sept. 23 — After a 41-7 loss to the Cincinnati Bengals, Kiam reportedly was overheard saying, "What a classic bitch. No wonder the players hate her," in reference to Olson in the post game locker room.

Sept. 25 — Kiam sent a fax to the Herald, offering an apology to Olson.

Sullivan apologized to Olson on behalf of the organization.

Mowatt, who earns $460,000 a year, was fined $2,000 to be paid over a 14-week period.

During a team meeting, the squad drafted a letter of apology to be signed by the team and presented to Olson. After the meeting, the letter was never mentioned by staff again.

Sept. 27 — The National Organization for Women in Boston issued a statement suggesting that women not buy goods made by Remington Products, Inc., the electric shaver company owned by Kiam.

Sept. 30 — Kiam and Olson met at a Logan Airport hotel coffee shop. Olson was called to meet Kiam the night before to accept an apology, this time in person. She accepted.

Kiam told several print and broadcast reporters that, "I intend to suspend [Sullivan] until the end of the investigation. He will have to suffer throughout the investigation as I will and Lisa." Kiam blamed Sullivan and media relations director Jim Oldham for not informing him sooner about the sexual harassment of Olson.

Tagliabue got wind of this and ordered Kiam not to suspend any Patriots personnel until the investigation concluded.

Oct. 1 — Olson said she was told by Patriots players, whom she did not identify, that the incident was planned to see how she would react. She also was told that between Monday and Thursday of last week, players involved in the alleged plan met to synchronize their versions and let Mowatt take the blame because he was the only one she could identify. Olson said other reporters were told of the alleged meetings by sources and that players sympathetic to her said there were more than four or five players involved in the alleged incident.

Tagliabue appointed Harvard Law School professor Philip Heymann to investigate the incident.

Soccer heads to Dartmouth

By JENNIFER ABATI
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will travel to Dartmouth University today for a 3 p.m. match.

Dartmouth, who, like other Ivy League teams, starts their season later than others, is 1-3. The Big Green triumphed over Pennsylvania but lost close games to Vermont, Princeton and Boston College.

UMass coach Jim Rudy said Dartmouth players to look out for should predictably be goalkeeper Deb Tripalbi and mid-fielder Gail Smith. Leading scorer Tracy Hagan is the Big Green's prominent center forward.

Rudy said that it should be a tough game because Dartmouth always plays the full ninety minutes right up until the end.

"We need to get early goals from them and stay motivated and enthusiastic."

The Reds are currently recovering from their tour in Virginia last weekend, in which they suffered a sprained neck, a damaged kidney, chest pains and possibly a broken finger.

"This won't hold us back though," said Rudy. "We'll just play the best we can with whomever we've got."

What do you get when you combine the rapid-fire of a snare drum, the sporadic tendencies of a guitar and the floating rhythm of a bass?

You get an astonishing non-verbal form of jazz communication, created by guitar deity Pat Metheny, bassist Dave Holland and legendary drummer Roy Haynes. The three will grace Northampton's historic Academy of Music with their rhythmic genius for two shows this Thursday, Oct. 4.

Metheny is touring this fall in support of his recent album entitled Question and Answer on Geffen Records.

Originally, the three musicians got together with no intentions of recording an album, just a desire to open up and blow.

Through mere happenstance, the trio was placed in a recording studio instead of a rehearsal studio, with the results producing a fantastic jazz voyage. The intimacy of the Academy of Music along with the inspiring improvisation of Metheny, Holland and Hayes, promises the audience a recreation of the same atmosphere as that of their time in a New York recording studio.

On the recording of Question and Answer, Metheny comments, "We had a great time. We played for about eight hours. It was like a small club gig in a recording studio. While I was playing, I wasn't thinking about putting out a record. I would have played differently if I'd known I was making a record, shorter solos, more attention to construction, that kind of thing. I just felt like playing. And everybody was really listening. To me that was the most inspiring part of this date: the intensity of the listening on a second-to-second basis was one of the highest levels I've ever experienced. It was a lot of fun, and it felt good to do something like this, to have a record that simply documents the way I played that one day."

Metheny's career has produced some of the most innovative modern jazz. His band the Pat Metheny Group was started in 1978 and although members have come and gone, his acclamation illuminates his success, with five Grammy Awards and a total of 11 Grammy nominations.

Dave Holland is responsible for founding the band Circle. In the mid-70s, Holland played in a jazz trio with drummer Jack DeJohnette and John Abercrombie, to form the group Gateway. His biggest contribution to the realm of jazz were his compositions for both bass and cello.

Roy Haynes has been a formidable pioneer for modern jazz drumming. Haynes has been involved with jazz since the early 1940s and has played with such jazz greats as John Coltrane, Thelonious Monk, Charlie Parker, Billie Holiday and Chick Corea. His latest accomplishment on Question and Answer proves that he still has magic sticks between his hands.

If you're questioning the need to experience this musical magistry, then Pat Metheny, Dave Holland and Roy Haynes are your answer.

Pat Metheny Trio will be performing two shows at the Academy of Music in Northampton on Thursday, Oct.4. Shows are at 6:30 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Tickets are $25, $22 and $18.50. The show is sponsored by the Iron Horse.

In the eye of the storm

By DANIELLE DOWLING

I remember the first time I heard Flotsam and Jetsam. It was back in the fall of 1988 when the sounds of their second album No Place for Disgrace blistered my ears.

I was impressed by the rhythm section of bassist Troy Gregory and drummer Kelly Smith. I was floored by the raging attack of guitarists Michael Gilbert and Ed Carlson. But what really intrigued me was the extremely high pitches that lead singer, Eric A.K., would reach. It left me with one question in my mind.

Does he squeeze his balls to reach those notes?

"No. I just don't have any," he replied in jest. "I just started doing them a long time ago listening to Rob Halford and trying to imitate him. I've gone overboard on the screams at every live show we've done since we've been together. I don't do it much anymore. But I used to just scream every lyric and got good at it eventually, so people tell me."

The group started playing the Phoenix club scene back in the mid-80s. Soon, they were opening for groups like Metallica, Anthrax, Slayer and Megadeth. According to Eric, this tended to be more of a curse than a blessing as the crowd in Phoenix tired of seeing the band play.

However, the band was discovered by Metal Blade Records who placed them on two compilation albums, Speed Metal Hell II and Metal Massacre VII. This led to the release of their first album, Doomsday for the Deceiver in 1986. It was an underground hit and the second best-selling album in the Metal Blade catalog.

In early 1987, bassist and founder Jason Newsted went on to become Metallica's bassist, leaving the group in a bit of bind as he took care of the group's essential business. They managed to get their act together and found bassist Troy Gregory to fill in Newsted's shoes. In 1988, they released their second album, No Place for Disgrace, on Elektra. Things seemed to be going very well for the group until the label decided to drop them.

"It kind of just made us a little wiser," Eric said in describing the effect the ordeal had on the group. "We know of a few things to look out for now with other labels. They (Elektra) have so many bands and not enough people to look out for them. They weren't giving us the attention we needed."

Thankfully, the man responsible for singing them onto Elektra, Micheal Alago, was able to move them to the Uni/MCA label where they released their latest album When the Storm Comes Down in May. Eric said the group was happy with MCA.

"They're trying a lot of different things with us. We're not sure if it's working yet," he explained. "At least they're doing something, anyway."

The group is also happy with the album. "We like it a lot better than the first two albums because we can hear each instrument individually," he claimed.

The members of Flotsam and Jetsam have varied tastes from which they draw their inspiration. Eric described the atmosphere when they tour together.

"We constantly have fights about whose tape is going in next," he said. "Usually one person's tape will go in and the four other guys will put their headphones on and listen to something else. I like to listen to a lot of mellow stuff like Simon and Garfunkel and James Taylor. Gilbert likes the Dixie Dregs and Steve Morse. Kelly likes to listen to Rush. Ed gets into a lot of Ted Nugent and AC/DC. Troy is into Joy Division."

The group plans to head back for the studio in January to record their next album, slated for a spring release. Eric said to expect a faster, heavier sound reminiscent of No Place for Disgrace.

With regards to the future, he said that he hoped for a gold album and the chance to headline the Coliseum in their hometown of Phoenix, but his other goal is rather simple.

"I'd like to afford my own apartment," he said. "I've gotten a lot farther than I thought I ever would, so if it all stopped now I would be happy."

Trustees agree to reduce work force

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, at a meeting Wednesday, approved one of the last steps before union employees may be legally laid off, a policy called retrenchment, a reduction in the work force for financial reasons.

At a meeting held at The Hadley Farm, trustees noting the series of state-ordered budget reductions that have struck the University in the past two months, authorized the the ground work necessary to reduce and in some cases eliminate academic programs.

President-Chancellor Duffey said yesterday that the final outcome of the retrenchment could be the lay off of up to 30 faculty members, a mixture of tenured and non-tenured professors. He also said at least 10 departments are slated for either reduction or termination.

He refused to disclose the departments. "This is not a moral exercise, not an exercise of whose department is better, who is working harder or whose department is more valueable," he said. "We are trying to make a decision [that cannot be made] with precision or made scientifically.

The planned retrenchment program was approved at last week's Faculty Senate meeting.

He said a team of five administrators have been carefully analyzing aspects of the programs for several weeks to best determine areas of painful cuts.

The team is investigating a "range of statistics" concerning the academic programs. The administration plans to present details of the proposed program reductions are eliminations to the Oct. 11 Faculty Senate.

Duffey said some of the factors the team is investigating include the amount of undergraduate and graduate students served in the department, research activities of the department and the "centrality to undergraduates."

"We will then look at other compensating statistics," he said. "Maybe low faculty-to-student ratio and other factors."

Student trustee Angus McQuilken said yesterday that the most likely that three or four departments will be eliminated, the remainder forced into reduced operations.

The University has lost 80 faculty positions since last spring mainly from positions not filled, Duffey said. "We will have to go beyond non-replacement and attrition — into layoffs."

Students 'speak out'

Over 150 gather at SU to protest EWC cuts

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

Over 150 students converged yesterday on the Student Union steps to take part in a "speak out" to protest budget cuts that have been made to the Everywoman's Center at the University of Massachusetts.

The Counseling and Outreach and Referral Programs, which operate out of the EWC, have been cut by the of Division of Student Affairs, a division headed by Dennis Madson, vice chancellor of Student Affairs.

Anne Ferguson, professor of philosophy and women studies sang a few songs, one of which was by Holly Near called "Fight Back." Ferguson concluded the song by saying, "That's what we have to do for the the EWC by any means necessary. Even if it means sitting in Madson's office."

Natasha Diephuis, president, Student Government Association said, "Students must become more involved in the process to decide which areas are cut and which are not. We must voice our priorities."

Maggie Magner, a rally organizer, said Madson cut Student Affairs 4 percent. The EWC disproportionately took 25 percent of that cut, reducing the EWC to a rape crisis center.

"Women with bulimia, difficulties surrounding "coming out" or problems adjusting to college life will no longer be able to partake in support groups at the EWC," she said. "Does this mean I am only important if I am raped?"

Gina Gombar, a member of the Progressive Organization for Women's Equal Rights said in the past two weeks 955 women have already requested services. Because the EWC has been cut many of these women will be unable to use the services.

Coaches: Privacy prevails

Editor's note — This is the second in a multi-part series examining amateur and professional press/locker room relations.

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

In the collegiate atmosphere of the University of Massachusetts, the general consensus of the administration and coaches in the athletic department, implies athletes' privacy in the locker room proceeds the needs of the press.

"I don't think there's any urgency situation [that would require the press to have access to a locker room]," said assistant football coach Doug Berry. He said the press should request names of players needed for interviews to the coaching staff, and that those players would then be made available to the press.

"Any of our players would stay in a room as long as [the press] saw necessary," he said.

According to Athletic Department Dean David Bishoff, the University currently does not have a press/locker room policy. He said it has been the coaches who have set a precedent for their individual sport.

"[Our coaches] are hugely reasonable people," he said. "They're educators, and I think the fact that there have been no problems in the past, supports that point."

"Oftentimes, policies follow the problems," said Bishoff. "My instinct is that if there is a problem, someone would step in and create a policy."

Police seek info into assault case

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University Police are seeking information from the community involving an assault and battery, which officials are investigating as a homophobic attack committed last Friday against a 20-year-old student.

The student told police that he was walking toward the Campus Center at about 11:30 p.m. on the path nearest the Campus Pond and the Tower Library when he passed a group of about 10 to 12 persons, comprised of mostly men and at least two women.

One member of the group apparently made a homophobic slur in the direction of the student, said Jack Luippold, deputy chief in the Department of Public Safety.

When the student responded to the slur, the man broke from the group and attacked him, Luippold said. He said the man punched him, knocking his glasses off. When the student fell to the ground to protect

Voters turning to Socialist Party

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Although there will be no Socialist Workers Party candidate on the November ballot, two party representatives said a growing segment of voters are looking to the party to rectify the fiscal crisis.

"There is a deep economic crisis in Massachusetts," said Russell Davis, a candidate for US Representative, in the 6th District. "The government represents the interests of big business and they want the working class to pay for the crisis. Both the Democrats and Republicans are going to raise taxes and cut social spending."

He said voters are realizing, through the fiscal crisis, that neither of the Democratic and Republican parties really represent majority interests.

"People feel this system isn't working," he said. "It's not that everyone agrees with our positions. Voters feel that they have no choice in the this election but see a need for change. The public has been more receptive to us than they have been in years."

The Socialist Workers Party is running candidates for governor, lt. governor, secretary of state, attorney general, treasurer and for three U.S. representative seats.

Faculty Senate begins ROTC investigation

By ALI WOOLWICH
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate is in the process of investigating whether Reserve Officers Training Corps discriminates against gay students, despite UMass membership in a national association of universities which urged United States Defense Secretary Dick Chaney to "call an end to discrimination . . . on the basis of sexual orientation by [the ROTC]."

On March 20, the Faculty Senate assigned four specific questions to be investigated by the Military Studies Committee:

- The extent to which the policy of the armed forces influences who can take courses in military science. [bullet] How the restrictions above determine who can be accepted in ROTC programs on campus.
- Whether the military proscription against gays, lesbians, and bisexuals violates State statute or University non-discriminatory policy.
- Whether University of Massachusetts students have been or will be academically or financially (through loss of scholarship aid) disadvantaged by this policy.

In a letter sent to the Defense Secretary on May 14, 1990, the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges, of which UMass is a member, denounced the Department of Defense policy, stating:

"We note a growing doubt about the need for such a practice and about its relation to the interests of the military, especially in preparation of a corps of future officers.

"ROTC programs should attract the best and brightest American college students; those programs should not risk the loss of outstanding young men and women, including many who may hold conventional sexual views but find discrimination unacceptable in any form."

The Military Studies committee at UMass submitted a draft report to the Academic Matters Council on September 18, 1990 in which it stated that "the committee cannot answer whether University students will be academically or financially disadvantaged...at present, we cannot foresee the circumstances under which this would occur."

However, an excerpt from the Spring 1990 newsletter of the Network of Gay and Lesbian Alumni/ae Associations states: "Three recent cases received wide media coverage — ROTC cadets dismissed from programs because they are gay."

"In addition, these three cadets were asked to repay the value of their scholarships — $50,000 for David Carney of Harvard, $40,000 for Robert Bettiker of MIT, and $25,000 for James Holobaugh of Washington University, St. Louis."

The Academic Matters Council requested that the committee make clarifications in its report and submit the revised draft at the next council meeting on October 17. The council will then make a recommendation for action to the Faculty Senate.

Occidentalizing has severe consequences

By ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

Picture: a bare-breasted, young Black woman posed against native mud huts, a typical National Geographic photo. However, on second observation, she is also wearing stereo headphones.

We in the West tend to ignore the modern when observing the "primitive."

In an intoxicating lecture last night entitled, We Think, Therefore They Are: On Occidentalizing the World, anthropology professor Deborah Gewertz of Amherst College said that we, the West, understand ourselves and what we are by our interpretations of the world.

However, when we misunderstand the "other, non-Western" we in turn misunderstand ourselves. This misunderstanding occurs when we "occidentalize;" represent the other as essentially and absolutely different from the West.

By "occidentalizing," she said Western anthropology separates the modern from the primitive. It misrepresents the "other" for our own purposes, disregarding their reality.

We live in the world and they live in our imagination. The lives that others lead are irrelevant. To begin with this is occidentalist essentialism.

Gewertz said anthropologists have occidentalized non-Western people as primitive, homogeneous and having predetermined lives constrained from choice.

This occidentalizing sends the message to the West we are heterogeneous and have the freedom of choices. She said it was possible to occidentalize ourselves as having choice when in reality, not all of us have choices. How many of the choiceless live along side us? Gewertz went on to ask, "Does the constraint of the one subsidize the freedom of the other?"

They are related to us in other ways than the texts in which we occidentalized them. She said defining their lives as irrelevant to ours is dangerous. Our political and economical interests affect them and they in turn affect how we perceive ourselves.

Gewertz questioned what is primitive and what is modern. She said it is necessary for anthropologists to deconstruct the definition of primitive and our lives can not be understood in isolation to theirs.

Gewertz said what we are is what we do to the world and getting them wrong is getting us wrong.

"Anthropologists must struggle, with passion and outrage, to discover the other's reality," she said.

Anti-theft program implemented

By MAURA CANAVAN
Collegian Correspondent

Operation Identification, a free program designed to help reduce theft on campus, will begin October 10 in the Southwest Residential Area.

Originally started in 1971, the program involves engraving property, recording the information, storing this information in a safe place, and placing warning decals on the doors of those involved.

"We cannot reduce crime without help and support from the public," said Larry Holmes, associate director of the Division of Public Safety, in a meeting last night about the program.

Commencing the evening of October 10, teams of students from Sigma Phi Epsilon and Alpha Phi Omega will go door to door in dormitories, equipped with electrical engraving equipment.

Property such as computers, calculators, stereo equipment, televisions, typewriters and bicycles can be engraved with the owner's social security or driver's license numbers.

Students will also be given an Operation Identification warning decal to display on their door.

"With this program, if an item is stolen, the chances of recovery are much better," said University Crime Prevention Officer Richard Besse, who is coordinator of the program.

He said that engraving property makes it less attractive to the thief since it can be traced to the owner.

"With a social security number on an item, we can simply punch in the number on the computer and immediately know who it belongs to," said Besse. He said that compact disc players are the "hot item" this year, as they are "very easy to walk away with."

"Operation Identification" must also be accompanied by other preventative measures. Holmes emphasized the importance of locking dorm room doors.

"Eighteen seconds is the average time it takes for a theft of a room," said Holmes. He said that student reporting of incidents is also extremely important.

The program is free and is provided as a service by the University Division of Public Safety Crime Prevention Unit.

Electric engraving tools will also be available at the Division of Public Safety for student use at no charge.

Areas that have used the program have seen significant reductions in property theft.

"We can't guarantee you won't be stolen from, but this program does reduce your risk," said Holmes.

Panel documents deterioration in Mass. state parks

By PETER HERING
Collegian Correspondent

The last three years have shown a deterioration in the preservation of state parks, according to a panel of environmental experts speaking in Amherst last night.

Joel Learner from the Executive office of Environmental Affairs for the state of Massachusetts said the future of Massachusetts state parks is in danger due to continuing budget cuts.

"We have seen the end of the golden era in the state park system," Learner said. "In the next 10 years we will see the closure of many of the state's parks and zoos."

Massachusetts, according to Learner, boasts the sixth largest park system in the country, has fallen on hard times. Loss of state funding has not only had an effect on State wildlife resources, but also on cities and towns which access these resources.

According to one panelist, the way the growth is occurring in the Valley is frightening. With a noticeable shift of people into the outlying suburban areas, development is becoming both formless and unbridled.

Alexandra Dawson, an environmental attorney, believes the government needs to protect and restrict growth in this area. "We need to purchase the land that is to be saved, and apply sophisticated zoning laws that would ensure its protection."

Other panelists agreed a balance needs to be achieved between development and conservation.

"We need to create a housing market, but we also need to set aside land for open space," said panelist Robert Rivard. "People want to belong to this community, but how many are we going to let in?"

The decline of agriculture in the State is also a concern which the panel addressed.

"Agriculture is very important for many reasons," said Kathy Ruhf of the Small Farms Institute. "The farming industry is an important source for food, plus it creates a diversity in the landscape."

All the panelists stressed it was essential to work with both the public and the media in keeping environmental awareness at a high level.

"The administration said in a memo that it's trying to promote students health, safety, and well-being and then they cut the EWC," she said. "What kind of message does that send to students?"

Gombar listed three demands from Madson:

- The students be allowed to partake in the process of deciding where the cuts are made.
- Assurance that the EWC will not be touched in the second wave of cuts.
- Restoration of the two most recently cut positions.

"If Madson tells you he can't reverse these cuts he's lying. The positions won't officially be moved until October 14th," Magner said,

Dan Cohen, a member of the Third World Caucus said, "Forcing women to go to Mental Health Services is like gargling with motor oil. It doesn't taste very good and it doesn't serve it's purpose."

After the rally, 50 women and men marched to the Whitmore Administration building where they yelled chants up to Madson's office.

Protesters went to Madson's office to leave messages and make appointments with him. The office door was locked. Eileen Stewart, dean of students, met the protesters outside the office. She offered to talk to students about the cuts since she is the Budget Officer of Student Affairs who makes budgetary decisions about the EWC.

Madson was not available for comment.

Just sitting here and thinking about what a productive week it's been for the majority of the world. Everyone seems to be very busy, except maybe Saddam Hussein.

Gayle Long

Well, the Red Sox have finally pulled it off — they backed into the division championship off the worst league in baseball (now let's see them beat Canseco and the Oakland boys). Anyway, let's thank those lucky Boston stars for the likes of Tom Brunansky and Mike Boddicker. It was really too bad Roger Clemens was shipped off to Toronto in case of a playoff game, which seemed imminent at the time, perhaps. Rocket wasn't there for the celebration, and as a team member I'd probably be really pissed.

The Germans have done it — a reunification, with both East and West prepared to handle the economic problems which await them.

They promised they will remember the past and never repeat it. I certainly hope for their future — a future of freedom of religion and expression. A nation where all are viewed equally.

Every German should read Survival in Auschwitz by Primo Levi or Night by Elie Wiesel, and realize the horror and hell of each of the six million European Jews who died at the hands of Hitler. The world will never again allow a country to slaughter a people for the satisfaction of a madman.

The Bush administration has done it (actually a number of things) — more deficits through the billions of dollars we have spent (so far), a TAX (read my lips) package which might even make it through Congress, and the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice David Souter.(It's hard to believe that Georgie could actually accomplish 3 — count 'em 3 — things in less than one term. Hey, more power to ya, George!)

Victor Kiam has done it — started a national trend of forbidding the female of the species (of sportswriters) to enter the locker room. No, not the entire species, just the females.

The Coach of the Cincinnati Bengals, Sam Wyche, was second on the trendsetter's list. Why did he lock the professional reporter out of the locker room after a game on Monday night? Your guess is as good as mine. Maybe he's afraid she'll see what his players have got and what he DOESN'T.

Read Mike Madden of the Boston Globe to find out which female reporter has gone back to the newsroom not with a story but with a lawsuit instead.

Thanks, Mike, for reminding the public that it's not the gender, but rather the ability that makes the writer.

Obviously, these two winners have forgotten that the pen is mightier than Lawrence Taylor.

And that women sportswriters never forget. Neither do their editors, and most of all, their male counterparts.

By the way, this week celebrates the Collegian's 100th anniversary. Can you believe it?

Why people for 100 years have read or worked for the paper is enough to blow my mind. It seems that one of the greatest pastimes here at UMass is picking on the Collegian. You try and be an editor for just ONE day. It's not a job, it's an asylum.

Enjoy the weekend. Until later, see ya.

Freefalling budget needs unified state

As a student leader, I feel a little bit like the little dutch boy sticking his finger in a hole in the dyke only to have another one open immediately; the latest being a proposed curriculum fee increase for next semester. And all of this while watching the tidal wave called CLT looming ready to wipe the dyke out completely and all that is familiar with it.

The administration chooses to call this latest $6 million the third cut this fiscal year totaling $16 million. But actually it is the fourth totalling over $22 million. The first 4 percent that was cut by the Legislature in late July was from a state appropriation that was already more than $6 million less than our appropriation from last year.

Marc Kenen

This $6 million was made up entirely by tuition retention. By the time this year's budget was passed students had already paid an extra $6 million from the biggest tuition increase in the Commonwealth's history. When the Sept. 5 cut of $4.2 was apparently going to be made up, partially by a fee increase, the student governments began to mobilize.

Despite the chancellor's sincere desire to provide financial aid, he knows and we know that this effort, as previous ones, will not reach all those who need it. Unmet financial aid at UMass is at an all-time high and rising. Any fee increase will be devastating to us. Make no mistake about it, we will lose students who cannot afford it, despite financial aid efforts.

Another serious question confronts us. When will the price increases reach the point where we start to lose students and in fact lose money? When do we reach critical mass? The much-publicized difficulties with this year's admissions, combined with increasingly troubled demographics, suggest that we are dangerously close. Once this point is reached, it will be next to impossible to correct it.

UMass is dependent on student revenue and if it begins to decline we all suffer, especially labor which will be forced to bear the brunt of all cuts that lay ahead. But now the cut we are facing is $10 million and we must re-evaluate.

The UMass budget and the state economy is in a freefall. We cannot, even if we decided it was the best way to move forward, implement strategic planning for this University. All we can do is hunker down, batten down the hatches and try not to lose too many people overboard. We might have to reduce our rations in order to feed everyone, but the choice on who lives and who doesn't cannot and should not be made.

I hope that cuts against the staff and faculty on this campus can be made where, like fee increases, those that can afford it must pay the most while those that can't afford it the least pay the least. We must protect our people.

The student leaders called a meeting last Friday with members of all the unions on campus to tell them that we are prepared to take our share of this $10 million as long as the burden is shared by everyone on campus, including tenured faculty and the highest ranking administrators. The various unions are meeting this week with their executive boards to discuss the situation and we will reconvene this Friday to discuss it further.

I must stress that this process does not replace the contractual obligations between labor and management, nor normal consultations and negotiations that would and must occur. But in addition to this normal process, we are trying to reach some consensus among us.

This unified position is critical to maintaining the social fabric of the University. But now the landscape is like a tinderbox, where one match threatens to ignite a raging firestorm that will consume us all.

We have asked the Board of Trustees not take any action until we are able to work through this process. We hope that by the end of next week we will have an idea of the direction it is going. Believe me, it will be worth it.

Marc Kenen is the vice president of the Graduate Student Senate

Analogy to castes ignorant and bigoted

Recent issues in the Collegian carried articles by Minu Sebastian and Adam Scales which expressed differing views on the role of ethnic minorities in the U.S. We would, however, like to address the slanderous statements in Mr. Scales' letter ("Allow me my own identity, please," Oct. 2) that were irrelevant to the issue and totally uncalled for.

The statements in question were, "In sum, I am left wondering whether Ms. Sebastian would actually prefer a society in which birth or ethnicity is the sole determinant of how one should lead one's life. If so, I would commend her attention to some of that cultural history she is so fond of, for she is certain to find many examples of such systems. They are called castes."

Mr. Scales must assume that the Indian community is singularly ignorant in his assumption that they would overlook the bigoted connotations of this vacuous statement.

Could it be merely coincidence that he uses the analogy of caste when addressing Ms. Sebastian, who happens to be of Indian ethnic descent? It seems that Mr. Scales has revealed his own bigotry by resorting to stereotypical imagery of Indians.

Indeed, his assumption that one can automatically attribute caste oppression to any Indian is like connecting terrorism with all Islamic people. Immersed in bigotry and ignorance about the conditions of 850 million Indians, he overlooks the fact that over 500 million of them (including many Christians from Kerala, who constitute Ms. Sebastian's ethnic background), are the victims of the very caste system that he sarcastically alludes to.

Concerned Indians of all castes continue to struggle to eliminate the harsh inequities of this unjust system, whose causes lie in a troubled history little known, apparently, either to Mr. Scales or the Collegian.

Two years ago on this campus, a member of our community was the victim of racial slandering by a conservative White publication. Mr. Scales has eloquently proven that one need not be White in order to denigrate Third World societies.

Columbus Day: More than another holiday

Soon after his arrival in the Caribbean, Christopher Columbus summed up his assessment of the natives in his ship's log: "With 50 men, we could subjugate them and make them do anything we want." This statement set the course for the conquest of the Americas for the next centuries. Next week a national holiday commemorates this landing.

Jeremy Levinson

The first contact between the Americas and the colonial powers of Europe touched off the most profound genocide in history, one that devastated three continents, destroyed some of the most sophisticated and egalitarian cultures of the era and brought death to tens of millions of people.

But, say the architects of Columbus Day, we claim Columbus as part of our Noble Heritage, but not the carnage that followed. If we press the official historian, we might hear a faint apology.

The history that allows us a long weekend out of respect for Columbus is popular history. It is not a history in which questions are asked; it is a schizophrenic history upon which the official National Identity is forged.

No surprise here: Popular history is always written by the winners. In this case, Europe and its child, the European American, create a heritage in which the native cultures are ignored and the devastation of Africa is apologized for by Dan Quayle as something belonging to another time. We want Columbus but refuse what he stood for and began.

It is the European and the European-American that has written the popular history of the United States. He has chosen bits from the past and pieced together a heritage that ignores the victims.

The official history of the United States was berthed from a Euro-culture. And, Columbus Day 1990 shows us that it still serves to hold one in place. What is Columbus Day supposed to mean to those of us who are African or Native American in descent? At best, it serves as a reminder of a brutal history. At worst, it reminds us of who still writes the official history.

How are we supposed to look at ourselves and our society in the present when we can't come to terms with our heritage? The upcoming holiday provides an all-too-vivid example. We would wipe this holiday from our calendars, and our children would never know that it existed. We could also use the day to take a closer look at the history of the various peoples that now live in the United States.

If, as we grew up, Columbus Day was the day of mourning as it should be, would we see our "nationhood" any differently? I am sure of it. The people of the United States have no history. We have many. We will never be one people as long as our culture continues to base itself in fake history. Our nation will never develop a cohesive society as long as our people's different histories remain glossed over by storybook versions of what is a long and not always glorious past.

Columbus Day serves as just one vivid example of our lack of national identity. It interrupts our education and work schedules to remind us that many of us have no real notion of where we came from. Indeed, it reminds others of a culture that is bent on denying their histories. Spend your Columbus Day well.

Crisis hotline provided

I am writing in response to the column entitled "Shock Therapy" (David Erickson, Oct. 1). It is my fear that the editorial revictimized women who have survived acquaintance or date rape on this campus. I want to address women who read this editorial.

One in four women on college campuses are the victims of rape. That editorial was a detailed description of rape and it cannot but put into the community without some information for survivors.

If you are a survivor, or if that scenario sounded familiar to you, or if you know a survivor and want to talk to someone, there is a 24-hour Rape Crisis Hotline at UMass that is staffed by trained female counselors. If you have any questions or need help or want to talk, please call. The number is 545-0800.

Some of the national issues that they are campaigning for are: a full military retreat from the Middle East to channel defense spending to fund health care, schools, housing, and child care; a reduction of the work week to 30 hours without a pay cut to combat unemployment; the defense of abortion rights and Affirmative Action; cancellation of the Third World debt.

On a state level, Davis and Margaret Pucci, the SWP candidate for governor, said the only way to resolve the state fiscal crisis is to reorganize the governmental structure to serve the needs of working class people by taxing the rich and by working against the effects of budget cuts already passed.

Both Davis and Pucci said they were not afraid to call themselves Marxists in a time when communist "regimes" in Eastern Europe are failing. They said communism has never existed in the world as it was theoretically intended and the former communist governments in Europe "had no business existing."

"As a Socialist, I believe the working people who generate the profits of the big corporations should not have to pay any taxes," Pucci said. "The working people are getting increasingly less state services for their tax dollars."

Pucci said the SWP did not get on the ballot because Massachusetts has the most restrictive legislative laws concerning the campaigns of Independent parties.

Pucci said if the SWP had submitted the required petition of 40,000 valid signatures to get on the ballot, it would have been scrutinized by the state, requiring at least 20,000 extra signatures to pass.

However, Davis said their street corner campaigning has caught the attention of women, minorities, students and the unemployed.

himself, the assailant kicked him several times.

Luippold said another member of the group pulled the man off of the student some time later. The group then left the student on the ground.

The student, who is active in campus productions, suffered a broken jawbone. After treatment at University Health Services, the student with police help attempted to locate the group but was unsuccessful.

Although the student is unsure, he suspects that there were other people in the area during the attack. When he returned with police after the attack, several persons told police that a bicyclist, riding with others, picked up the student's glasses.

Luippold said the assailant was a white man, approximately 5'10" with a medium build. The man has short blond or strawberry-blond hair and a flat-top hairstyle.

"We would love to find his glasses — he really needs them," said Luippold. "But we would also love to find the guy who beat him up."

The altercation was the second assault and battery reported to police that night. Five minutes before this incident, a Southwest student told police that he was assaulted with a solid object near the Student Union and the Library.

Police said the assaults appear to be unrelated.

A look at R.E.M.'s rise from the underground

By ADAM McCLORY
Collegian Staff

Remarks: The Story of R.E.M.
Tony Fletcher
Bantam Books

There is no question that R.E.M. will go down as one of the best bands of the 80s.

They played their first live show on April 5, 1980, at a church in a town where singer Michael Stipe and guitarist Peter Buck lived. The scene is familiar here and at other college towns across the nation: by word of mouth, half the campus knew there was going to be a huge party with three bands and free beer. R.E.M. was the last band to perform and they gave the crowd a very fun and enjoyable show. The group now had a firm base to take off from and they used it to their advantage.

Now, ten years later, R.E.M. is stronger than ever. Through eight albums, countless road trips to seedy towns in dead-end bars where the band almost outnumbered the crowd and inevitable disputes, the original four members have remained.

R.E.M. has come up with a beautiful combination of musicians who mesh incredibly well: lead singer Michael Stipe, guitarist Peter Buck, bassist Mike Mills and drummer Bill Berry. The first material by the band was a mix of both originals and 60s covers; this was a welcome surprise to the college crowd of Athens, Georgia who were looking for something different to listen to.

This quick success enabled R.E.M. to look outside of the Athens market. They took their show to North Carolina where they played a few shows to incredibly ecstatic fans. The cult following of the group had begun, although all of the band's shows were not going to be this memorable.

Regardless, they were brought to the attention of I.R.S. Records and were signed to the label to produce their first five albums. Murmur, with the popular single "Radio Free Europe," was released in the spring of 1983. Although the sales weren't anything to write home about, it was given endless praise by major musical magazines.

R.E.M. rode this success and decided to embark on their first real tour. They didn't stop there though — after the tour the band went right back into the studio to record their second album. out of this came Reckoning, with popular hits such as "(Don't go Back to) Rockville" and "Pretty Persuasion." With this release within a year of Murmur, plus the fact that they played over 100 shows in 1984, R.E.M. acquired the reputation as being one of America's hardest working bands.

Would anything stop this machine? Yes. Burnout hit the band in a very tough way — recording was not fun anymore, the whole record business was not as appealing as it was a couple of years earlier. R.E.M. turned out Fables of the Reconstruction, a dark album that was not among their best efforts. Nonetheless, the band was around at the right time and the record became an instant hit on college radio. Subsequently, the band did an extensive college tour to promote it.

Despite the band's problems, they re-grouped and continued to turn out one album each year with Life's Rich Pageant in 1986 and Dead Letter Office (mainly B-sides and other previously unrecorded material) in 1987. Document was released in the fall of 1987, a compilation titled Eponymous was released in October of 1988, and finally Green came out in November of 1988. This rapid recording pace paralleled the group's following in the United States; they gained fans by the thousands. R.E.M. had successfully made the transaction from a normal college band to one of the best bands in the world.

Tony Fletcher did a very credible job in writing this biography of the band. He was objective with his assumptions and his amount of information was extensive. Inevitably, the question of "selling-out" will arise concerning this book. Did R.E.M. do this solely for the money? I really don't think so. With R.E.M.'s second record deal (with Warner Brothers), they became financially secure for life. Their desire to put out this book, might just lie in their feeling of accomplishment that comes with putting out a decade of interesting and exciting music. Look for this trend to continue, with R.E.M. putting a new and different twist to each and every piece of music that they release.

Censorship controversy over Vio-lence

Censorship has been a hot topic in recent months. First, there was the uproar concerning the Robert Mapplethorpe exhibit. Then, there was the clamor about 2 Live Crew. Now, we may have to add the San Francisican thrash metal group, Vio-lence, to the list of those caught in the censorship controversy.

The group, comprised of vocalist/lyricist Sean Killian, guitarists Robb Flynn and Phil Demmel, bassist Deen Dell and drummer Perry Strickland, recently released their latest LP, Opressing the Masses, on the Megaforce/Alantic label.

However, before the album's release, Atlantic executives demanded that the song "Torture Tactics" be deleted from the record or toned down. They claimed the song might be deemed offensive. Not wanting to slow the momentum of the group down, Megaforce executives agreed to delete the song in question.

Vio-lence, who are known in the thrash scene for their relentless speed-mongering, will release "Torture Tactics" as a separate single which will not receive Atlantic support. But they are not complacent about this.

In a statement to members of the music industry, Killian said, "Extreme pressure is being exerted by groups like the PMRC [Parents Music Resource Center], some factions in the music industry and other various 'concerned' groups. This pressure runs a domino effect course through the label and distributor and in the end forces the creativity of the artist into a corner."

Vio-lence will open for Flotsam and Jetsam at Katina's on Sunday.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Refuse to be rattled by unexpected developments. You may want to ask an older family member's advice before making a major decision your romantic appeal is stronger than ever!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Stick to your guns! You should never be afraid to take a chance on yourself. Romance should be exciting this evening. You enjoy meeting someone new. Keep a tighter grip on your wallet!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Untried abilities and activities occupy your thoughts today. The highway to success may be paved with challenges. See how much you can accomplish in a limited amount of time. Work at full speed.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Wonderful surprises could come through travel. You benefit from joining forces with old friends or former work mates. Your popularity quotient is high. Influence others.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Be receptive to people who wish to back you privately. there could be a big payoff. Confidential talks could lead to positive changes in your finances. You find out where your real support is. You have more presence than you can imagine. Flaunt it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) You could be going through a turbulent period. Avoid making decisions with long-range consequences. Concentrate on completing solo projects. Someone is working behind closed doors on your behalf.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) It pays to be highly visible today. You have superb stage presence. Dress to impress. Joint financial ventures and major purchases enjoy favorable influences. Good luck accompanies you.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) You delight in your new mobility today. A lively conversation provides food for thought. Live it up and splurge a little. Allow plenty of time to reach your destination if traveling by car.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Family and career affairs could conflict today. A loved one may expect a larger share of your time. A candid conversation with a close friend helps. Be direct and you win new respect.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Concentrate on creative efforts. Home life could be tricky. Tact will help you avoid arguments with relatives. Follow up stock tips you could be lucky! Romance may be a guessing game.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Misunderstanding, unacknowledged resentments or suspicions could cloud a relationship. Attempt to clear the air by expressing your feelings. Spend time with those you truly enjoy.

PICES (Feb. 19-March 20) Others may lean on you today. It is wonderful to be needed! Investigate an unusual travel opportunity. Adventure beckons from afar. A good day for do-it-yourself projects.

Volleyball 'plays to win' vs. A-10

FELICE COHEN
Collegian Correspondent

The goal for the University of Massachusetts volleyball team is "play to win," said coach Carol Ford. Starting things off at home at Totman Gym, the Volleyball team faces Rutgers tonight at 7 p.m. and Temple tomorrow afternoon at 4 p.m.

Both Rutgers and Temple are in the Atlantic 10 conference, and both have records of 8-10.

"I'm not as concerned with our record (2-13), as our quality of play," said Ford, whose team is coming off of two tough matches against West Virginia and Duquesne. What do the Minutewomen have to look forward to against Rutgers? Tough serves, said Ford.

"We're expecting a very tough match from [Rutgers]," said Ford. "We need to emphasize our serve receives. Our key right now is passing and we're working on a few new areas in our offense. I hope they'll work."

As for Temple, Ford said "they're another tough team which only lost a few players last year to graduation."

Equestrian team hits stride tomorrow

By JEN FATKIN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts equestrian team will be competing in the first show of the fall for All-Region III-North teams, hosted by Mount Holyoke College at its lavish equestrian facility Saturday.

The competition will begin at 8:30 a.m., and will run well into the afternoon, with the jumping classes starting around noon.

The UMass team is co-ed, and consists of twenty-five riders of varying abilities. Each competition is divided by levels, from open (most demanding) to beginner.

This system makes the intercollegiate team one of the few sport teams in which the less experienced athlete can gain valuable competition experience, exposure and critique. Riders of all abilities are given the chance to qualify for the regional finals, the zone finals and the national finals, held at the end of the spring semester.

Each rider competes for individual points and awards, as well as for university team awards.

The team will be competing against riders from eleven other colleges in the area, including Smith, Mount Holyoke, Hampshire College, American International College, Becker Junior College, Elms College, Williams, Springfield College, Westfield State and Worcester State.

Football travels to URI for Yankee Conference battle

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team, which beat the run against Maine and the run-and-shoot against Boston University, faces the University of Rhode Island's balanced attack Saturday in Kingston. Kickoff is 1:30 p.m.

The Minutemen enter 2-0-1 overall and 2-0 in the Yankee Conference, while the Rams are 3-1, 1-1 following last week's 24-19 loss at Delaware.

In that game, URI quarterback Kevin Neville threw for 357 yards and two touchdowns, but was intercepted three times, and tight end Darren Rizzi caught seven passes for 154 yards. The Rams' offense had previously been dominated by runningback John Newson, who leads the Yankee Conference in scoring average at 12.0-per-game. Newson enters tomorrow's game as the second leading rusher in the league with a 116 yards-per-game average.

Rhode Island scored 41 points in beating Towson State in their season opener, and blew out Richmond 37-0, and Brown 23-3.

"We still haven't faced as balanced a team as we face here," said UMass coach Jim Reid.

"Rhode Island has a senior-type team and fifth year quarterback, which is always not very good for the opposition. And this is a stronger defensive team than Holy Cross."

The Rams have allowed 286.8 yards per game, the lowest total in the Yankee Conference. Senior cornerback Kevin Smith picked his fourth interception and the 21st of his career at Delaware, but bruised a thigh late in the game. Smith is listed as probable for this weekend.

The UMass offense meanwhile, played its most even game of the season last week against BU, rolling up five touchdowns, 47 points and 570 yards on offense as quarterback Gary Wilkos passed for 198 yards and ran for 106 more.

Wilkos and Reid both credited the UMass offensive line — Rich Cavanaugh, Paul Mayberry, Jay Gabbe, Anthony Guidice, Kai Dietiker and tight end Ron Villone — for opening up enormous holes against BU and for keeping the Terriers backpedaling between snaps as well.

"Jay Gabbe is the key to the tempo," said Wilkos. Ried added, "It might sound trivial, but after the play, [Gabbe] runs back and sets the huddle right away, then breaks and runs back to the line of scrimmage.

"You get into a flow, it just seems like you're always on the ball, ready to go. That's what we call tempo."

The Minutemen rushed for 372 yards against BU and average 300 yards rushing a game, tops in the conference.

Game notes: The game will be broadcast on WMUA 91.1 FM, WSPR 1270 AM, and WTTT 1430 AM . . . Al Pogarian, who started at center for two years before breaking his ankle midway through last season, returned last Saturday and saw action at guard . . . Reid owns a 4-0 record against URI as head coach . . . The Rams bill sophomore kickoff return specialist/wide receiver Chris Pierce, 5-foot-5, 150 pounds, as the smallest major college football player in the nation, a title that UMass' Eric Thimas will challenge this weekend.

Temple boasts A-10's top score

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

It's gut-check time for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team. UMass travels to Pennsylvania this weekend hoping to recreate the formula which earned it five straight wins and a No. 8 ranking nationally.

Saturday the Minutewomen take on St. Joseph's, and Sunday they encounter No. 9 ranked Temple.

St. Joe's is 3-5-2 (0-2 in the A-10) and is coming off of a 3-0 loss to Villanova. The Hawks are currently in last place in the A-10. They have lost games to Rhode Island 2-1, and Rutgers 3-1.

UMass cannot afford to look past the Hawks, but it will be tempted, with a tough and talented Temple team lurking a day away.

Sunday's game should provide plenty of excitement as Temple, led by the spectacular Jane Catanzaro hosts, the Minutewomen in a battle of top ten teams.

Catanzaro is torching opponents with goal after goal. The senior forward has 30 goals (seven for game winners), and two assists. No one in the Atlantic 10 is even close to her in scoring.

But Temple has more than just one threat. Lori Warneka has two goals and 13 assists, while Monique Scally has 12 assists. Toni Byard has four goals and Stacie Barndt has three.

The Owls host Boston University on Saturday, thus negating any notions that they may have an advantage against UMass due to fatigue.

Temple is the most explosive team that UMass will face all year. The Owls have out scored opponents 44-16.

UMass coach Pam Hixon would not say who was starting in goal over the weekend, but don't be surprised if Tina Ruisecki makes her first start of the season against St. Joe's. Look for Philippa Scott to get the nod Sunday.

Hixon said she was looking for someone to step up and assume the role as leader. This would be the perfect weekend for someone to do that.

Women's x-c chases pack

BY DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

On Friday the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team will compete with Providence College and the University of Connecticut, at 4:30 behind Totman.

Hosting the immensely talented Providence squad will prove to be quite a task for UMass (2-1). The Friars are ranked No. 4 in the country and first in New England.

"Providence should win the meet easily," said UMass coach Julie LaFreniere. "They are a phenominal team that may be able to sweep the first five places. Most of their runners are from Ireland and are on scholarship, making it difficult for the rest of New England to compete."

The real competition in the meet should be between UConn and UMass. UConn is ranked No. 6 in New England, while UMass is 8th.

"This race is going to be very competitive," said LaFreniere. "It will be an exciting race that should come down to the end."

To win, UMass will need strong performances from top runners Becky Johnson, Kathy Holt, Kelly Liljebald, Michelle St. Laurent, and Cathy Crocker. Also needed will be a return to form of Dana Goldfarb and Mo Meldrim, who have been hampered by various injuries and illnesses.

LaFreniere is hoping her team can run in a tighter pack and close the gap between first and fifth.

"UConn runs in a pack," said LaFreniere, "and we have to run in a pack to win. We need to target UConn runners and go out and get them."

"Everyone is in good shape but they are tired. The team really worked hard the past two weeks. We have had speed workouts on the track and distance practices through Orchard Hill. Our times should be better this week."

Head football coach Jim Reid stated yesterday that the staff would begin to enforce an age-old locker room policy, which is stated in the media guide. It reads: "As a Minuteman, you will be treated in a first class manner. The recently renovated locker room is for use by the football team only."

"Jobs need to be done," Reid said. "I understand there's a priority to get a story in by deadline."

Although Reid said he understands the urgency of the press, he added that in a collegiate setting, privacy of the players is the more pervasive issue.

Associate Athletic Director Elaine Sortino said she had never encountered nor been informed of any press access/locker room problems.

"Access shouldn't be an issue," said the head softball coach. "Professionals understand professionals. I would simply announce to my team that the press will be in to interview them, and for 10 minutes they'll keep their clothes on."

Head lacrosse coach Ted Garber said at college age, some players are not ready to cope with the media and act as adults.

"In a college scenario, players are of all different ages and different stages of maturity," he said. "They all feel different about who's looking at them."

Men's soccer coach Jeff Gettler said athletes have a tendency to be more professional, act more mature when they are clothed.

"Athletes should be presented to the press so that they look like athletes — in their uniforms or with a shirt and tie on," he said in reference to television interviews conducted in locker rooms. "As a coach, you should want to work with the press. It's important to."

Gettler said that all press persons should have access to players, but that players need private space, space to regroup and act as a team.

"Access shouldn't be an issue, but because it is a locker room, it becomes an issue."

Men's tennis washed under

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team must wish the rain had come first, and then the wind. If the rain came first the match would have been washed out, but instead it was the wind that had a role in the game, resulting in UMass' fifth straight loss.

The Minutemen played host yesterday to the University of Hartford in torrential rain conditions. Nonetheless, Hartford was able to adjust its game and better UMass 5-2 in a rain-shortened contest.

The two victories for UMass came in singles action. Richard Stone was able to defeat his Hartford opponent, Dan Brahler in straight sets 6-3, 6-2. Also winning for UMass was Tim Lipsky, who downed Hartford's Jason Hong 6-3, 6-2.

UMass coach Manny Robert's pointed out the play of Stone and Lipsky as the only bright spots.

UMass' No. 1 singles player, Barry Wadsworth, did not display his usual game and was easily defeated by Hartford's Greg Weiss 6-2, 6-3. Two of the three doubles matches were halted as a result of the rain. In the only match, Hartford's number three team was victorious 6-4, 6-2 before the skies opened.

"We really have no excuses," said Roberts. However, he didn't hesitate to add, "a hurricane doesn't help."

"We just didn't come up with the kind of play to win," he said. "If you're going to win you have to learn how to play the tough matches, regardless of the conditions."

The team, 3-5, will conclude its season next Tuesday as UMass hosts Franklin Pierce at 3 p.m.

CENTENNIAL

AGGIE LIFE

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

In 1916, the Collegian ran a statement which still holds true today: "Membership on the Board [of Editors] is by no means a lazy man's [or woman's] job, but the work offers ample recompense in practical journalistic experience."

The day-to-day pressures of the newsroom — the rush to make deadline and the painstaking decisions of what makes it into print — is as true today as it was for the first editors of our paper.

The Massachusetts Agricultural College, founded in 1863, already had its first taste of student newspapers by the time the first edition of Aggie Life was published in 1890.

But there were many predecessors to Aggie, the first regular publication on campus, to inform students at the College.

The Cycle, which ran for 10 years, began publishing in 1872 as a fraternity-based newspaper, but came out only once a year just before graduation.

In 1870, The Amherst Record gave MAC a page of its own in their paper, aptly named "Massachusetts Agricultural Department," which existed for 11 years.

In 1890, nine years after the dismantling of MAC's page in the Record, a group of students began their own campus newspaper, Aggie Life, with the first issue hitting the stands on October 1.

Aggie Life's Board of Editors consisted of seven men, who produced a three-column, eight-page paper which was published bi-weekly. Students paid $1 a year to receive the paper.

By 1901, the term Aggie was no longer a favorite among the students and staff, and in that same year the name of the paper was changed to The College Signal by a 115-4 vote of the College's student body. The students also voted to tax themselves $1.50 for the publication of the paper.

The Signal, published weekly in 1909, was again replaced in 1914 by the more familiar name, The Massachusetts Collegian.

By 1923, the Collegian's Board of Editors consisted of six editors, four associates, and six members of the business staff.

The newspaper's first female editor-in-chief, Mary Boyd was elected in 1925. Under Boyd, there was a slight reorganization of the Board of Editors.

In 1931, the College's name was changed to Massachusetts State College, and four years later the students again voted to raise their tax for the Collegian to $2.

It was in 1967 that the name of the Collegian was modified to today's Massachusetts Daily Collegian, publishing Monday through Friday throughout the school year. At this time, the newspaper began to subscribe to the Associated Press wire service, to receive local, national and international news and photos.

By 1975, the paper had a circulation of 18,500 and an average daily paper contained 24 pages. Containing almost 200 staff members, the Collegian had an annual budget of nearly $280,000, with 71 percent of the revenue coming from advertising.

And today, in 1990, the Collegian has 16 editors, over 150 staff members, run on a yearly budget of $500,000 and has a circulation of 21,000.

The graphics and business departments are a vital part of our network, responsible to a great extent for the daily publication of the paper.

The business office, with nearly 30 employees, is the paper's lifeline selling the advertising and balancing our budget to keep the Collegian afloat.

The graphics department, which now has only its second female production manager, the first female manager was hired a year ago last spring, employs over 40 students. Graphics employees paste-up the entire newspaper to make it more pleasing to the eye.

After 100 years of serving the students of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, Massachusetts State College and the University of Massachusetts' students, today's Collegian is vastly different than it was a century ago, but our purpose remains the same . . . to print all the news that fits.

100th Anniversary!

Student Life

The Collegian: a chronicle of our University

More than 100 Collegian alumni, their guests, journalism faculty and current students will gather on campus this weekend to celebrate the 100th anniversary of college journalism at UMass.

The history of the paper has some bumpy stretches, particularly in the past 25 years, as minority and female students have struggled to make their voices heard through a vehicle that, for most of its life, had been run by White men, as many of the early selections in this supplement will amply demonstrate.

Like every other institution both on and off campus, the Collegian still has a ways to go in reflecting the multicultural nature of the campus.

But we should note that, after having a minority of women in the newsroom for most of its life, the majority of the Collegian staff this year is female, including its editor-in-chief, managing editor, editorial editors, co-sports editor, production manager and business manager.

Despite the paper's shortcomings, it remains a remarkable chronicle of student life at UMass, and the history of the campus, beginning with Aggie Life in 1890, to The College Signal in 1901, to The Collegian in 1914.

From the monumental decision at the turn of the century to adopt a new campus yell, to the Vietnam War years, to its current coverage of the state's budget mess, the Collegian continues to serve as the paper of record for an ever-changing campus.

The newspaper has also served as a training ground and learning laboratory for hundreds of student journalists, graphic artists, photographers and business people.

The roster of Collegian alumni includes recognized authors like William Manchester and Paul Theroux, and reporters and columnists at newspapers all over the country, including The Boston Globe, The Miami Herald, The Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times.

The keynote speaker at this Saturday's Collegian alumni dinner will be alumnus Alan Lupo, a columnist for The Boston Globe.

Other Collegian alums have gone on to work in the fields of law, public service, education, medicine, business and entrepreneurial endeavors.

The articles we've excerpted here are by no means a complete cross-section of the past 100 years at UMass.

We chose pieces for their humor, their evocation of the times and to show that in many ways at the University of Massachusetts, the more things change, the more they stay the same.

If your favorite page or subject is missing, we apologize in advance, and remind you of one informal old Collegian motto: "All the news that fits, we print."

Aggie cheer

"Say Ed, you see that chumpy-looking freshman over there? Well, he's the most insolent chap I have ever seen. Guess what he said to Bill this morning."

"Out with it old boy, out with it."

"Well, Bill met him on his way to hash and said 'Hello freshman. What's your name?'. The cur turning round looked him in the eyes and said, 'Just a moment I'll give you my card.' Then thrusting his hands in his pocket, he began a seemingly diligent search for one, and finally having kept Bill waiting for five minutes, just think for five minutes, he sarcastically said, 'I forgot I left them at home, sorry to have kept you waiting so long, good morning,' and passed on. Now, Ed, I consider that a downright slap in the face to the whole sophomore class, and something must be done to teach the cur that he is a freshman."

At a meeting of the Senior class, R.W. Morse, H.L. Knight and L.C. Claflin were appointed a committee to devise a new college yell. From several submitted, the best was chosen, and on the recommendation of the committee formally adopted by the student body in mass meeting. All preceding yells were abolished. The new yell is as follows: Mass! Mass! Mass'chusetts! Rah, rah, rah! Mass'chusetts. (1901)

Senate OKs class cuts, athlete subsidies

Again, the Collegian has taken the opportunity to quiz the Senate and try to discover what the Senate thinks. Last week, the outgoing Senators voiced their opinions on questions relative to the college; continuing in the same vein, the present members were quizzed on similar subjects.

Q-Do you favor unlimited cuts in classes and convocation?

Frank Southwick, president:

"Definitely yes. College students should be able to decide for themselves whether or not they can afford to cut. Let them rise or fall on their own decisions. As for convocations, better speakers would attract more students."

Q-Are there any sports you know that are not practiced here and that should be included in intercollegiate athletics?

Fran Riel:

"Yes. Certain sports, such as squash, handball, fencing, lacrosse, skiing and winter sports other than hockey should be put on an intercollegiate basis. This would give those students that do not go out for major sports the chance to compete."

Q-Do you think this college should subsidize athletes?

Warren Tappan:

"An athlete just graduated from high school or prep school and having no funds to further his education but the ability to obtain passing grades in college should be granted financial assistance by means of jobs or scholarships, as long as he maintains passing grades. We would not have to worry about our standards being lowered as the requirements at Mass. State would admit only the athlete who is also a scholar."

Q-Is Hell Week an outworn custom, out of place on this campus?

Gordon Najar

"Hazing has definite value as long as the motive is to give the freshman an idea of the purpose and ideals of the house. When it becomes a chance for upperclassmen to take unfair advantage of freshman, it is then an evil." (1938)

Basket Weaving 101

By MIKE KNEELAND

Ever since college became a good alternative to the working world, students have been constantly searching for one thing: gut courses.

For those of you who have been taking 19 credits per semester in such courses as Microwave Engineering and Applied Nonlinear Analysis, a definition is in order. A gut credit course which guarantees a high grade with little or no work.

Most students, however, do not freely admit they are taking a course because of its gut reputation. "I've been into sandboxes and mudpies since I was a little kid," one student said. "This is a real learning experience, something I can relate to."

When a gut course has been discovered, it's more cherished than a good fishing spot. Gut courses are only discussed between close friends for if there's one thing an enterprising student hates to see, it's a gut course over-enrolled. (early 1970)

UMPD's Tom Moran friendly, heart of gold

By Phil Johnson

The next time you hear the booming voice of the law demand that you show him your license and registration after you have been caught committing the ignominious crime of driving too fast or furious near the campus, relax, friend — it's liable to be Tom Moran, the seemingly harsh individual who represents the long arm of the law at the University of Massachusetts. But Tom has a heart of gold under him efficient exterior, and his primary purpose on our campus is "to protect the student for the good of all." However, very few students are aware of the heavy responsibility which his position entails.

One rainy afternoon last week, Tom and yours truly spent a few drenching hours together during which this reporter had a spledid opportunity to observe all sides of the police profession at college. Tom, having served in both wars and as a special officer in Springfield, Vermont, has been representative of the law and order on our campus for fifteen years this month.

Don't panic!

Despite the efforts of the MDC staff to verify rumors concerning campus drug busts, very little solid evidence has been turned up. Only four arrests have been confirmed. Rumors that State Police have the authority to spot check any dorm on campus, that dozens of students are languishing behind bars, and that the only safe smoke is Camels are unsubstantiated. Our advice to you is DON'T PANIC.

New Radio Station WMUA Organizes; To Be Ready For Operation In Month

MemHallBecomesDorm As Sixty Frosh Move In

Memorial Hall became a dormitory this week with the arrival of 60 Stockbridge freshmen who will be temporarily billeted upstairs in the auditorium.

Herbert A. Randolph, housing director, announced this week that while no set regulations for the use of the building by students would be published, all are asked to cooperate in making things easier for its new inhabitants.

The rest rooms will be switched, with the one on the first floor now reserved for women and the upstairs room for men. The commuters' lounge in the basement will continue to be used.

Mr. Randolph expressed the hope that the men would be out of their temporary quarters by November first, but declined to set a definite date.

Students entering the building during the late evening hours are requested to use the south door, although the west entrance will not be locked.

"We will not prohibit the other students from using the lounge," Mr. Randolph concluded, "but we hope they will be as quiet as possible, since those living in Mem Hall must use it for a study room."

"If you heard strange signals on your radio last Monday, don't worry- it was just the test transmitter for the new campus radio station WMUA (Massachusetts University at Amherst), giving indication of coverage," said Wayne Langill, Station Director, in a recent interview.

Transmitter Site Being Selected

Professor W. W. Smith of the engineering department and engineering student Jay Doane were at their two way mobile radio units equipped to pick up the signal and to report back to another unit at the transmitter in South College the strength of the Signal at various points on and adjacent to the campus. This will help select a suitable spot for the new transmitter which it is hoped will be ready in from thirty to thirty-five days.

Women Wanted

Dave Meitzer, Public Relations Director added, "Frosh and Sophomores, especially girls, since they are in the minority, are urged to meet with us if they are interested in any feature of radio work.

"The station will be located at So. College, fifth floor as it was last year. We hope to tie up with neighboring stations around Amherst for football games within the near future.

"Come one, come all, if you sing, dance, act, or would just like to get into radio work, contact one of the above-mentioned staff members and we'll try to find a spot for you.

'New' Methods of Birth Control

● Meds: No physical contact

(Editor's Note: The following article was found in a medical textbook. It would be interesting to know how many Massachusetts legislators still support this type of birth control)

You will need to develop, from the beginning, habits suited to your teaching and consistent with married celibacy and ascetic wedlock. You believe sex expression is sin, except for procreation. If this means four babies in the average twenty five years of married life, you may have occasion for sex union less than twenty five times, perhaps only four or eight times. Therefore:

Beware of anything and everything that might start to rouse sexual desire or excitement, such as any bodily exposure. Arrange for separate rooms and baths, or separate bed, bathing and dressing. If only one bed, then to bed and out again at different times; no cuddling each other on winter nights; no contacts. Don't dress in bedroom except alone.

Cut down all caresses; a kiss is to be perfunctory; holding in arms, rare and brief, no sitting close of evenings. Married love has dangerous opportunities until you become physically completely indifferent to each other."

● 'Ludes' subbed for 'Pill'

By MAY B. PREGNANT
Collegian Staff

The University Health Center today recalled all birth control pill perscriptions issued during the last nine months.

Health Center officials said the Center's pharmacy had inadvertently been distributing Rorer 714 tablets (Quaaludes) in place of the birth control prescriptions.

Health Center director Hugh Itch said, "Gee, we're really sorry about all this. I mean it could have happened to anyone, right? I mean, we all make mistakes, right?"

Officials estimate between five and six hundred University women were issued the prescriptions and "should be realizing something isn't quite right just about now."

Itch said the situation is complicated by the aphrodisiac quality of the Rorer 714s . . .

Students streak around campus

By BOB SCHEIR

A crowd of at least 250 streakers took a 40-minute, two mile nude run around the capmus last night before returning to Southwest to claim they had captured the world streaking record.

The streakers, wearing party hats, neckties, an occasional T-shirt, and most often nothing at all emerged from the lobby of John Adams around 9:20 to the cheers, clicking cameras, and applause of around 2,000 students.

Several hundred spectators were led on a wild chase across campus as the streakers who made their way from Southwest, to the Campus Pond, Orchard Hill, Central, Northeast, and through the Campus Center Concourse in 46 degree weather.

When the streakers finally staggered into Southwest again, about 1,000 people gathered around John Adams to hear a student on a bullhorn announce an "official" count of 475 streakers which he said broke the world's record.

"I just had to be in on a tie-breaking thing," said one streaker as he puffed his way from North Pleasant St. toward the Campus Center.

Another streaker, dressed only in a brown raincoat and shoes, stopped to catch is his breath near the campus pond. When asked why he streaked, he thought for a moment and said, "The motive eludes me. . .it's a kind of mass shock thing. . ."

Another streaker, fully clothed after his arrival back in Southwest, said he was graduating next year "and I wanted to do something worthwhile besides learn something. . ." He said he was calling the Department of Public Safety because he had locked his valuables and keys inside his car.

Streakers reported no harassment form either onlookers or campus police.

When the panting streakers finally entered the Campus Center Concourse, the smell of sweat and the sounds of victory chants filled the jam-packed concourse.

As the line of naked bodies jogged through Northeast, some of them seemed to make their way through Leach House before streaming across North Pleasant St. back towards the campus center.

"Okay, off with the clothes. . ." someone yelled through a bullhorn.

"It'll probably decline after this," puffed one streaker. "We just wanted to break the record."

But David L. Johnston, director of the Public Safety Dept., said he thought streaking would continue till the end of the semester.

"Generally, a fun evenig was had by all," Johnston said.

Opinion

The adoption of a new college yell by the student body is most decidedly a move in the right direction. It has long been felt that none of the old yells were at all satisfactory. Not only were they so poorly constructed that they fell far short of producing the volume which so large a body of students should have obtained, but they were also obectionable in that they referred to the college as "Aggie" entirely neglecting the word "Massachusetts." This college is and has been the state college of Massachusetts; it is but fitting that this fact be recognized in student activities.

. . .The adoption of a new college yell but reveals even more plainly our entire lack of something nearly as important, a good, stirring, college song. We have referred to this already on more than one occasion, because we feel that it is now one of our most serious defects. Nor can we see any reason for being in such a predicament. To say that no student, either past or present, who possess ability enough to compose something adequate to our needs, would be to cast a slur on the college as undeserved as it would be false. . .

Advice to freshmen

TO THE CLASS OF 1940:

Are you bewildered by your preliminary round of freshman activities? Transition from high school to college is somewhat bewildering, yet if you make the change properly, you will have successfully completed one of the most important phases of your adult career.

You are adults now, you know. A year or so ago, no one, not even your parents, would have dared call you such without a twinge of conscience. But now, because you are in college, you must think and act as befits an adult. Education for you now is not a spoon and bottle process, but an experience to be undergone with the adult characteristics of responsibility, concern and adaptability.

For a week or two, the campus will be yours. You will be shown about and treated like a visitor on a sightseeing tour. You will be examined, catalogued and ordered about — all because the college wants to help you in your transitional process. But to you alone falls the problem of formulating a collegiate program that will make your college life a success.

Suggest Now or Weep Later

The rapid growth of the U. of M. has become a hackneyed subject. We've burst the seams of classrooms, we've been packed tightly in dormitories, we've overflowed Bowker and Draper, and now we're buying motor scooters to squeeze in between cars.

When the Class of '54 were freshmen, they were told that only sophs, juniors and seniors could have cars. When the Class of '54 became sophomores, they were instructed that only juniors and seniors could have cars. When their junior year rolled around, everyone expected the worst. But naught came to pass.

Since then enrollment has increased to such great proportions, the problem once again rears its ugly head. Whether it be because of a higher standard of living, more students, a wealthier undergraduate body, or sheer lavishness, the number of cars has also reached the bursting point. The present parking facilities just can't support the number of driving students. Long range planning is taking this problem into consideration but what of the present? Will we soon face an edict that only seniors may keep cars in our campus community? How can we find a solution? Will the students concerned give the problem enough mature thought to recommend plausible solutions? Will the students express their ideas? Or will the traditional lackadaisical UM Student Body sit back until the administration must step in to protect them?

A Black Awakening

There is to be a meeting of the University's black community on Monday night to review the final draft of the plan for an Afro-American studies department which is to be submitted to the Administration.

This welcome and long-overdue development in the face of a rising tide of black student resentment and frustration about the progress of black studies at the University. These feelings were discussed in a recent letter in these columns by Brother Steve Moore. It is true that we have at the University the beginnings of what could develop into one of the most effective and educationally stimulating black studies programs in the country. But this only adds to the frustration of black students who are unable to take advantage of these courses because their schedules are overloaded with "required courses" of dubious relevance to anyone, black or white.

Education which does not prepare us for liberation, spiritual, political and economic, is a waste of time. Black students have no time to waste. Brother Moore was right on when he called white America's education polices towards black people "colonialist pacification" programs. This has always been the case, and the existence of black studies courses which do not lead to a degree which do not replace irrelevant requirements, and which many blacks are therefore unable to take are just window dressing.

Brothers and sisters, we have begun to organize and we must continue to bring pressure on the Black Studies Committee, the administration, the faculty and any group which stands in the way of our educational needs . . .

THE RETURN OF CHANCELLOR MAN
SIGH!
PEOPLE SAY I'M NOT TOUGH ENOUGH FOR MASSACHUSETTS POLITICS...
I WISH I COULD SHOW THEM HOW WRONG THEY ARE!
BUT MY ADMINISTRATIVE SUPER POWERS ARE USELESS IN THE FACE OF MASSIVE BUDGET CUTS!
LAST SEMESTER WAS SURE DIFFERENT - I SHOWED THOSE CRAZY PROTESTORS FROM THE PSRU HOW TOUGH I COULD BE!
BIFF! POW!
JUST LIKE IN THE COMICS!
BUT NOW THE BUDGET IS WORSE THAN EVER SIGH!
I GUESS IT'S TIME FOR DECISIVE ACTION AGAIN...
RING!
IT'S THE UNIVERSITY OF DELAWARE CALLING, SIR. ABOUT THE JOB YOU APPLIED FOR.
I'LL TAKE IT!
YES SIR! DECISIVE ACTION!

Suddenly last summer . . .

On the advisement of the editorial staff of the Collegian, I decided to devote my first column to what I did last summer.

Of course, this could only be the ramblings to a pre-pubescent schoolgirl relating a trip to the Bronx Zoo or the Fun House — but in the course of reading you will find that this analysis is not far from true.

Paul Theroux

Sure, I'm male and post-adolescent however, you'll find that my summer was populated by characters which would not be foreign to any zoo or Fun House.

I went to Puerto Rico.

The Editorial Staff only knew half of it; that's the half I'll tell.

Last May, in a state that can only be referred to as derangement, I got a job on a ship bound for the Lesser Antilles.

So you don't know where the Lesser Antilles are?

Neither do I, even now, because I only got as far as the Greater Antilles — the prickly heat capital of the Tropic of Cancer.

I could tell you about a ship strike and an ulcer attack and poverty and chthonians and black great-dugged women; but it's the other detail you want, I know.

If you've ever seen a movie of Borneo or Sumatra or Madagascar starring John Wayne and the whole cast is constantly tossing off shots of rum in open air bars with a fan moving at one r.p.m. and there's flypaper crammed with dead insects dangling in front of the camera, and an old lady weeping way down the end of the bar and dirty pictures and obscenities all over the walls and a native barkeep who has narrow piggy eyes and knows everything that's going on; and outside, the naked kiddies are romping in the gutter smells under a large Coca-Cola sign (in Swahili) and the stucco walls are all cracked and lousy looking — then I won't have to describe Puerto Rico to you.

It's a zoo of the mobile flatulence of turistats: really terrible these off-season babes — pecked with acne, puffy, fubsy, fleshy and all in the "... soft bloom of pthisis." One can only view the tourists with whatsontelevisionnex-tweek emotions. Any thing else would be insanity.

And insects! My God, spiders, beetles, ants, crawling, flying, swimming at me from a million directions. Cockroaches in phalanxes of twenty and thirty. Enough to keep a whole lecture section of Ent. 26 students busy for their whole college career (of course, they would be given rest periods occasionally which they would spend in that section of the Hatch reserved for Entomology Majors).

I caught a cockroach in a jar once (he was making off with a pair of my sneakers and had already put on my UMass sweatshirt) and was starving him to death until I found that his diet was the same as mine — beans. So I slipped a few into his jar and we had supper together often.

As a friend remarked, ". . . only a madman would keep a cockroach!" but I can relate to a cockroach much easier than a dog.

Somehow I can't picture myself saying, "On King! Up, big boy!" Then grunting in chorus with the mutt.

The cockroach lived well until I strangled him in a drunken stupor late one night.

Black bugs in your cereal again?

To the Editor:

At approximately 9:40 on Wednesday morning, a friend of mine was in Hampshire Dining commons, eating breakfast. She went to the counter and picked up a box of cold cereal, casually glancing at it. Upon seeing a hoard of tiny black bugs crawling around in the cereal, she immediately (and understandably) became extremely revolted, and called it to the attention of a Dining Commons Attendant. The woman looked into the box, muttered a barely audible "Again!!" and shrugging her shoulders, removed the cereal from the counter.

Need I say more?

Dining common patrons lack etiquette

To the Editor:

It has come to our attention that rudeness and uncouth behavior prevail at South Commons. Throughout the time meals are being served, the murmurs of polite conversation are continually pierced by vulgarities. Vocabulary fit only for locker room expletives is used at dinner tables, resulting in waves of nausea on the part of others of more restrained natures.

Most girls wish to enjoy a meal without risking a loss of appetite.

The male contingent of South Commons is in desperate need of a crash course in correct table manners. Neglecting the art of polite dinner conversation, they shout from table to table, often using crude Anglo-Saxonisms to convey their messages.

We would rather starve than be contunually subjected to this type of gross misbehavior.

We would like to request that our names be withheld.

Agric. education moves forward with vigor

Twenty-eight years have passed away since the original bill, having in view the establishment of Agricultural Colleges, in the various states of the Union; received the approval of the President. Since that time great advances have been made in agricultural education. Each of the older states has some institution meeting the requirements of the Land Grant Act, and in many of them Agricultural Colleges are maintained on an independent basis. From small and imperfect beginnings these institutions have risen to their present high state of efficiency. Public sentiment has gradually awakened to the need of just such colleges, for the education of our young men, and the appropriations for the support have been constantly growing more generous. The movement of agricultural education has always been forward. Although it may have seemed at times to stand still, it has, nevertheless, soon started forward againe with renewed energy. . .

UMass' future

By Jawn

Ya know? This school is getting mighty big. In another decade the place might be compared with BU, Columbia, Howard, or some other nationally advertised brand of educational factory.

Things as a whole, however, are reasonably passable right now. That is, things as holes. But stop for a day or two and make a few reflections and speculations on the picture you might view if you have nothing else to do on a dreary day 20 years from now and decide to give the campus a visit. I already have. Here's the picture I got:

1968 — Enrollment 32,001

Enrollment: 32,001 students, 25,000 of whom are freshmen and 2,000 bona fide members of Scrolla and Maroon Key. The remaining 5,000 students, when broken down into upper classes, turn out to be sophomores, juniors and seniors. The extra student came with the school when Morrill proposed the land grant act a century before.

Name of School: Massachusetts Agricultural College. Forced to eke out a living from the land because of a total absense of jobs available when they graduated, a small group of faithful alumni — some 20,000 — banded together one night on the library steps to sign a petition to the Mass. legislature for a name change. (Ed. Note: Didn't help the steps any either.)

They argued that the purpose of the school was to prepare persons for life-time occupations; they hung their heads and cracked their knuckles, the school had failed to fulfill. "Too many engineers" and "eleven teachers per pupil now" were cries of several disappointed professors of UM sheepskins. . . (1940)

University College to continue expansion

By GERALD W. VIGEANT
Staff Reporter

. . . The Old

Thirty-four young men took a three hour exam in English grammar, geography, and algebra at a brand-new campus 100 years ago and became the first class at which is now the University of Massachusetts

They had arrived the day before and were greeted by four professors, including the president, Dr. William S. Clark. The group was lonesome and heartsick after viewing the construction on the raw campus. Today's students on the growing UMass campus often voice similar sentiments.

The thirty four applicants were all accepted.

This was a far cry from the problems of this year's entering class of 3,000 freshman at UM. More than 17,000 applied for admission.

The first class had a campus which consisted of four buildings on 310 acres, built at a cost of $46,000. Today, the University has more than 100 major buildings on its 1,100 acre central campus, with an assessed valuation of motre than $50 million.

The life of a student was quite different 100 years ago. Admission to M.A.C. carried with it an agreement to work two hours a day — without pay — for the College. In the fine old tradition of "early to bed early to rise," all students were awakened at 6 a.m. After breakfast they spent 15 minutes at prayer. Lectures and classes were held from 9 a.m. to noon. They then spent 30 minutes in gymnastics or military tactics. After the noon meal, they owrked afternoons on the farm and studied.

The student of today at UM avoids early morning risings, Saturday classes and anything else that might interfere with a few hours sleep. But he probably stays up later because of the plethora of extra curricular and cultural activities available in the modern day . . .

The New . . .

The final proposals for the Univeristy College should be released by administration this week, according to Prof. William C. Harvard, the chairman of the Committee to Plan the Academic program of University College and head of the Department of Government.

The final draft of the proposals has been gone over revised and approved by the committee and is now being printed, Dr. Harvard said.

The 100-page report, Dr. Harvard explained, "states our broad educational aims and working assumptions and provides a curriculum plan which we think is most exciting."

Briefly, the report will outline the recommended four-course curriculum, describe all other relevant academic arrangements, blueprint the proposed administrative structure, describe the favored physical facilities and make suggestions for phasing the development of the College.

Racism protest continues

By RICK SASSON
Collegian Staff

An estimated 150 minority students, who have occupied the New Africa House since Friday to protest campus racism, plan to negotiate their demands with Chancellor Joseph Duffey at 1 p.m. today inside the New Africa House, a spokesperson for the protesters said.

Mark Codling-Davy said the protesters began "rehashing" their original list of demands yesterday, but would not comment on the details.

Among the original demands were the expulsion of the five students involved in the alleged Feb. 7 racial fight in Sylvan Residential Area, and the suspension of police officers involved in an alleged lineup of black students following a reported sexual harassment in Cashin House.

The student refused to let Duffey into the New Africa House on Saturday at about 4 p.m., according to University Spokeswoman Jeanne Hopkins-Stover.

Codling-Davy said the protesters turned Duffey away because they were not yet organized.

"He [Duffey] is very willing to comply with us within his bounds," Codling-Davy said. "It's not that we're consistently turning him away. We are not trying to be antagonistic."

Duffey, who left town yesterday morning to visit his brother who is reportedlv very ill, issued an open letter of disgust in response to the Sylvan fight (text of the letter pg. 3). He said yesterday he anticipates a productive meeting.

The protesters delivered a signed card to the chancellor's house to wish his brother well, said spokesperson Joella Costello, and Duffey returned the thought with a basket of fruit.

"I was moved by their sending their card and I feel affection and respect for them," Duffey said.

Codling-Davy said the nationwide media attention is "trying to make this a Tyson-Spinks fight type of thing. It's not that at all."

Said Codling-Davy: "We are looking for the betterment of racial situations on this and other campuses, and ideally around the world."

The occupation was spawned by a fight which six white men, five of whom are freshmen in MacNamara House, are accused of beating two black students and harassing one white student.

An eyewitness to the fight said she heard racial slurs, including "nigger."

"Jerome Smith, James Cunningham and Sarah Whittle, all residents of Northeast, filed charges last week against the six, including: assault, assault with a dangerous weapon (workboots), civil rights violations and conspiracy. (1988)

Wood charges fiscal interference

By MARY BROWN
MDC Staff

UMass President Robert C. Wood has recently issued a report charging the state government with "efforts to curb the University's fiscal autonomy," which is necessary to keep the campuses free from "political interference," according to Sunday's edition of the Boston Globe.

The article said that the report, a preliminary edition of Wood's larger annual report, contains warnings to the state legislature and executive branch to resolve the University's fiscal independence "early in 1976."

The report comes after a year-long struggle on the part of Wood to minimize cutbacks in the 1976 University budget, and at a time when state legislators are reviewing 1977 budget requests, submitted by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis

According to the Globe, the report also explains the "new internal measures in financial management, especially in the introduction of our austerity program."

The article also said Wood included information on the opening of the Worcester Medical School and teaching hospital in the report.

"Wood says UMass is 'in growing peril' even though it has just passed through a 'year of testing,'" the Globe reports, referring to the increased control over the University budget as a result of the prolonged budget debate of 1975. (1975)

Humphrey cancels UM speech

By RICHARD LANE
— SENIOR REPORTER

Former Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey was forced to cancel a major speech on American foreign policy for the 1970's in the Curry Hicks Cage last night by a group of approximately 250 students chanting "Guilty," and throwing objects such as jelly beans and marshmallows at the DVP guest speaker.

A near capacity crowd of about 3500 had attended to hear Humphrey's speech.

One half hour before Mr. Humphrey arrived, the group of student demonstrators had swarmed into the Cage, blowing horns, carrying signs, diplaying balloons, and chanting "We want the Hump."

They situated themselves in front and center of the podium. Just before Humphrey's arrival one student took the microphone and stated that the DVP speaker would be allowed to talk and then, "The people are going to give their rebuttal.'

Distinguished Visitor Program chairman Mike McKenna tolld the crowd that due to the popular demand of those interested in in the Curry Hicks Cage last night by a group of approximately 250 students chanting "Guilty," and throwing objects such as jelly beans and marshmallows at the DVP guest speaker.

Mr. Humphrey prefaced his remarks by saying, "I shall try to give answers worthy of a university campus." He was applauded by the majority of students at this point.

The first question he was asked was why he had not spoken out at the time of the Chicago riots in 1968 or attempted to actually stop them.

CHICAGO (AP) — The no-bra look has its delights, both for men and women, but two surgeons caution that today's pleasure may turn into tomorrow's sorrow.

While there's no known medical harm from the current fad, the doctors say it hastens the day when a bra becomes a necessity.

Writing in the Jan. 31 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association, they point out that the ligaments which hold the breasts erect stretch without the support of a brassiere.

BOSTON (AP) — Those long, flowing winter scarfs may be fashionable, but they can also be dangerous, says a Boston plastic surgeon.

Dr. George H. Gifford Jr., of the Children's Hospital Medical Center, says the long, brightly colored scarfs popularized for winter fashion can be a serious health hazard if caught in machinery. Strangulation or broken bones could result.

In an article appearing in the current issue of Pediatrics, Dr. Gifford urges the fashion industry to give greater consideration to the safety aspects of the styles it pushes.

NEW YORK (UPI) — Excessive use of marijuana probably triggers insanity only in persons who are a little unbalanced already, a University of California researcher said yesterday.

Dr. Sidney Cohen was among the authorities participating in a conference on marijuana — a three-day event sponsored by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the New York Academy of Sciences and the Department of Psychiatry at New York Medical College.

Some authorities reporting on federally funded studies of longtime users of marijuana outside the United States found little difference between users and non-users on such things as ability to work and brain function.

Is Paul a dead man?

A rumor is spreading around campus and the nation that Paul McCartney has been dead for over two years. Evidence supporting this claim exists in lyrics and illustrations of Beatle albums.

A man named Billy Shers was transformed by plastic surgery allegedly and selected to take McCartney's place. In response to the claim, Ted Nahil of WMUA personally called Apple Records and the Beatles press secretary flatly denied these rumors.

However speculation persists. "I buried Paul" a voice chants at the end of Strawberry Fields. If the song Revolution Number Nine is played backwards, "turn me on deadman . . . turn me on deadman . . ." can be heard. At the end of I Am a Walrus, if one listens closely, he will hear under the garbling, lines 249 to 258 of act IV, Scene VI of King Lear, which is a passage about untimely death.

Can all these innuendoes really mean that Paul is dead and the public has been duped for over two years. Larry Cox, program director of WMUA claims that voice graphs show no difference between old and recent recordings of McCartney's voice. But there are too many references to death to be just coincidence. Perhaps it is all just a big hoax, or maybe the Beatles have a hang up on death, or maybe somewhere in England there is one hellava a good plastic surgeon.

Students protest racism at UMass

When courtesy prevailed

By ELWIN McNAMARA

Two students protesting the policy of South Africa were "requested to leave" yesterday's women's field hockey game by Dean of Women Helen Curtis and Ruth Totman of the Women's Physical Education Dept.

The game was between a team from South Africa and a local club.

Abdul Samma, former student senator and head of the International Club, was distributing leaflets protesting South Africa's apartheid policy when he was approached by Dean Curtis and told "not to do that here."

He was then asked to leave the field by Miss Totman.

Samma stated that he was "surprised at the harsh words of Miss Totman." The former senator told the Collegian that, "If in this great democratic country, I cannot express my feelings freely, what kind of impression can I carry back home?"

"I came 8,000 miles to witness democracy in action, in this great country. To me this was the saddest moment of my stay here, for the two administration officials to tell me not to distribute these leaflets."

Trustees Approve Change of Name to "Massachusetts State College"

The Board of Trustees of the College, in a special meeting held in Boston on Nov. 10, voted to approve the recommendation of President Thatcher that the necessary legal steps be taken to change the name of the college to the Massachusetts State College. Hon. George H. Ellis, chairman of the Board, and its executive committee were authorized to represent the Trustees in petitioning the legislature at its next session, which opens in January, to enact the necessary legislation to make this change effective.

This action followed a full and free discussion which was introduced by a statement by President Thatcher. This statement was prepared by the President as a part of his annual report. The latter normally is read at the annual meeting of the Board in January, but the present situation seemed to warrant earlier presentation and consideration of this particular matter. The statement is quoted in full on this page.

Also, a committee of the three members of the Associate Alumni appeared before the Trustees and presented the views of the alumni which favored a change of name as shown by the questionnaire which was conducted this summer. This committee consisted of the following officers of the Associate Alumni: Charles H. Gould '16, President, D.H. Buttrick '17, Vice-President, and W.L. Doran '15, Secretary.

Nader urges UMass action

By MARK VOGLER

Expounding on consumer abuses and the undertakings of his Washington-based public interest research group, consumer advocate Ralph Nader addressed an overflowing crowd yesterday afternoon at Curry Hicks Cage. Urging students to combine both their role of a student and one of a citizen, the guest speaker pinpointed the major flaw in the American education system of today.

"The development of student concern in the 60s shook off the dual burdens of the 50s," noted Nader. "In many issues, thus breaking the stereotype that victimized students in society with a prolonged adolescence," he said.

"The question to ask yourselves is how much was done with how much and how much more will be done in a continual way in the 70s if students will devote a little more of their time?" he added.

Nader told the crowd just what he had observed on a personal visit through the Princeton University library. He recalled that one-third of the students were "shooting the breeze," another third were gazing at pages at the rate of eight per hour, and finally the remaining third were "lying flat out with their faces on the book with saliva drooling out."

UMies: the marrying kind

By MYRON FISHER

With misty eyes and an aching heart we recall our halcyon freshman days when there were no hurricanes, earthquakes or chaos. But it is with horrible griping sensation that we think of our first theme for English: Why Did We Come to Massachusetts State College? By now, we think we know why, but that isn't fair for publication.

At any rate, we decided to discover the real unexpurgated reason we set out on a Great Quest to Find Out. Selecting freshmen from here and there to obtain a cross section of the class, we popped the question and waited for what we thought would be a typical answer. The result was amazing, so amazing, in fact, that we thought it best to have some of the answers anonymous.

This is why freshmen stray from home to come to the wilds of Amherst:

Albert Mikels, Roxbury: "I'm a local boy who wants to make good."

S.C., Boston: "They kicked me out of every other place, leaving this as the only college I could attend."

Barbara Bentley, Northampton: "I came here to see how firm the terra firma is. (i.e., a geology major. Pun.)

Unknown Freshman: "I came here to see what farmers' daughters and backwoods girls look like. Also, I wanted to get far enough away from my girl at home so that I could get another."

Julius Erving: Doc defies gravity, UMass retires '32'

By ROGER CHAPMAN
Collegian Staff

As far parties go, you'd have been pretty hard pressed to find a better one going on Saturday night.

All of the elements were there. The most famous doctor ever to graduate from the University of Massachusetts, a packed house of what turned out to be some pretty loud people and a basketball game that was worth every second of the two hours people sat waiting for the event. After blowing a 16-point second-half lead, the UMass men's basketball team recovered in time to eek out an 80-76 win over the Dukes, snapping a five-game losing streak.

It may seem odd, but the main event wasn't necessarily the game between the visiting Dukes and our own beloved Minutemen (10-14 overall and 5-11 in the Atlantic 10). Instead, the 3,898 people who filled the Cage from 5 p.m. were there primarily to see the retirement of No. 32, the jersey worn by Julius Erving during his playing days here at UMass (1968-71).

The roof of the Cage shook from the applause when Erving made his way to the floor from Section B. It was deafening, and you better believe it was deserved. After his entry, the night's guest speakers, New York Knicks head coach and UMass alumni Rick Pitino, former UMass head coach Jack Leaman, the captain of the 1969-70 team, Ray Ellerbrook and the coordinator of the whole bash, Ron Nathan spoke briefly.

After Nathan spoke, he and the Doctor proceeded to the baseline directly under teh banner raised in ERving's honor. The banner was unveiled, Erving said a few words of inspiration to the Cage faithful and the Minutemen, and then it was time to play.

Those words sure did a trick in the first half, especially in the early going, as the Minutement simply exploded. After Duquesne's Kevin McCarthy knotted the score 4-4 on a 10-foot banker, UMass went nuts. It started when a Lorenzo Sutton tippin of a Duane Chase miss with 17:27 left in the half and UMass leading 6-4. 14 points and 7:16 later, a pair of Chris Bailey free throws ended a 16-4 spurt that saw UMass bolt out a 20-8 lead.

Party time right?

Well, for the rest of the half of the party began to roll. The Dukes attempted to claw their way back in the game, but UMass was equal to every spurt, short as they were, and went into halftime with a solid 44-32 lead, something aided in part by 50 percent shooting from the floor and 13 David Brown points.

"This was a real gutty performance by our guys," head coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "They want to win so badly (the way they played) was almost impressive at times."

Sox win pennant, campus goes wild

By RON LARRECQUE
News Editor

The University campus broke into pandemonium last night when the Boston Red Sox clinched their first pennant in 21 years.

Forming in the Southwest complex, the demonstration moved to the Student Union where more than 6,000 exuberant students from all parts of campus gathered around a bonfire by the pond.

The cheering crowd then slowly made its way up Norht Pleasant St. bringing the spontanious rally to the Amherst College campus.

Some ninety minutes after the demonstration had begun, the still ecstatic studnets dispersed to the various dormitories, fraternities and sororities.

President Calvin Plimpton of Amherst College, when contacted by the Daily Collegian, had no comment on the deomonstration, but said that "it is wonderful thing that the Red Sox son the pennant." UMass' President Lederle expressed his pleasure in the orderliness of the students and the fact that no incidents had been reported to him.

It was learned that President Lederle spoke to a number of students during the demonstration.

Amherst Town Police, contacted shortly before midnight last night reported only minor incidents of "a few stolen street signs."

The excitement generated on campus was unprecedented in UMass history.

Said one male student, "It's pretty wild up here. I'm running around campus kissing every pretty girl I see . . . and they just smile and kiss me back."

Field hockey goes for it all in '90

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

How does this sound?

National Champions!

Kind of reminds you of UNLV, Michigan, Georgetown, Louisville, Indiana, etc. The University of Massachusetts could have a national champion of their onw.

No, it's not the basketball team, (they too may win a national championship, but probably not this year). The next possible national champion is the field hockey team? Maybe.

Ever since Pam Hixon took the reigns at UMass some 12 years ago, the field hockey team has been just about the school's best bet to win a national championship, (the women's soccer team has been a pretty good bet, too). Hixon has guided the Minutewomen to 10 out of 11 NCAA tournament appearances, and with any luck, 1990 should be her team's 11th showcase in the big show.

The Kathy DeAngelis era is over. DeAngelis was the working horse for the Minutewomen last season, she led the team offensively with 16 goals. Also gone are Bernie Martel, Carol Smith and Kathe Derwin. Martel and Smith were steady four-year contributors, who will be missed. Derin did not see a lot of action due to a severe knee injury, however, she was very much a team leader.

"Those kids will all be missed," Hixon said. "Huge holes — I feel to fill — both the leadership aspect as well as kids who are going to have to pick up the slack in terms of scoring and playing this year."

Bromery calls for region plan, CLT defeat

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

Positive media coverage is necessary for higher public education to gain support to defeat the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition in November, according to the chancellor of higher education for Massachusetts.

In an address to the Massachusetts Society of Professors last Friday in the Campus Center, Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery stressed the importance of informing the public about programs such as regionalization of the state higher education system.

"There is a perception that the public university doesn't have to be of top quality," Bromery said. "Perhaps we are overqualified in [the voters'] eyes."

Bromery said one of his goals was to speak to every state representative and senator in the Legislature, claiming that he "talked to about 40 already."

Discussing the "abysmal ignorance" of the members of the Legislature he said, "It's apparent to me that one of the problems . . . is the fact that state representatives and senators graduated from those [private] institutions."

Bromery said the education system needs to be "pro-active." "Every time we are on the front page of the [Boston] Globe, it's negative," he said. "How do we get positive headlines about what higher education does?"

Regionalization is one way Bromery said he believes public thinking will sway. "The public must see positive cooperation," he said. "Let's get out how much collaboration we do, and enhance it."

Bromery cited an example of technology's role in regionalization, explaining the use of video link at the University of Lowell.

He said a class in FORTRAN at Lowell was video-linked to Lowell High School, simultaneously teaching the two classes. Students at Lowell High could raise their hands and be recognized by the professor, who would answer students' questions.

Bromery claimed the education system is approximately "60 percent into regionalization, but no one knows it."

Because of programs such as the Five College Program, Bromery asked, "Why can't we have an exchange within state colleges and the University on this side of the state?" The Five College exchange offers

Female sportswriters offer feedback on locker room issue

Editor's note — This is the third in a multi-part series examining amateur and professional press-locker room relations.

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Female sportswriters enter the locker room knowing what they're up against, whether it be egos, nudity or obscenity. But these women, just like other professionals, love their jobs — and sports — perhaps that's why they keep plugging away.

"You're never fully prepared for degradation," said CBS sportscaster Lesley Visser, who covered the New England Patriots for the Boston Globe when she was 21-years-old. "No one escapes it."

For those who have yet to encounter major incidents, they cringe when Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson's name — and reputation — is put through the wringer and no immediate action is taken by responsible parties.

"This wouldn't have happened in the NBA," said staff writer Mary Schmidt of the St. Paul [Minn.] Pioneer Press. Her beat includes the Minnesota Timberwolves, as well as sidebars for the Minnesota Vikings at home games.

"[Decisions] would have been made by now. A player like [Zeke] Mowatt would be gone. I would have thought [the NFL] would have come down harder and sooner — it's dragging on and on."

"[Olson's] work is going to suffer, she's going to suffer," said Dallas [Texas] Morning News writer Kelly Carter. Carter has been in the business for five years and joined the staff in January.

Olson has been on vacation and has not been available for comment. Fellow staff reporter Bob Holmes said she may switch beats. He added, "She loves hockey."

"Whatever path she continues [careerwise], I hope she's successful," Schmidt said. "People don't care how Olson feels, what she's going through."

Reporters are not the only ones watching out for trouble.

"No team wants to be next," said *Houston [Texas] Post*staff writer Melanie Houser. She has been a beat writer for the Houston Oilers on and off for seven years. Prior to that she worked in the Southwest Conference. "The possibility of something happening is constantly in the back of your mind."

Last week the left guard of the San Diego Chargers told San Diego public realtions personnel that he did not want Houser in the locker room. Prior to then, the Chargers had not had a woman in their locker room, they said. Before practice, Houser said she and the PR people worked out the kinks and no problems occurred.

"Luckily, I haven't had too many incidences. I usually try to deal with it through the proper channels myself," Houser said. "I go in expecting the worst and then get pleasantly suprised — sometimes.

"The locker room situation now [as compared to 10 years ago] is much better," she said. "The players are more accepting, although they don't necessarily like it."

Schmidt of the Patriots said, "Unfortunately, this is not a new phenomenon. I'm always a little amazed that these things still happen. People should know by now that we're not just going to go away. I thank God everytime it's not me."

"No one ever really bothers me," said Carter. "I'm tall [6-foot-2] and Black. They're intimidated by me. I can look most of them in the eyes."

Carter interviewed a New York Giant for a 1986 preseason game in the Giant locker room. The player was naked. In passing, Lawrence Taylor threw a towel at the player, saying he should be polite and cover himself while there was a lady in the room. LT was not talking to the media at that time.

LSO may regain litigation

Officials hope for coordinated campus effort

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Student leaders and administrators at the University of Massachusetts are devising a multifaceted plan for student legal problem solving which would include the restoration of limited litigation to the Legal Services Office.

The plan under discussion operates with the stipulation that litigation is to be used only as a last resort when all other means of medition have been exhausted.

The plan incorporates the coordinated efforts of the Ombudsman Office, the Mediation Project, which is part of the Dean of Students Office, the Human Relations Office and the Legal Services Center.

"We want students' problems to be solved with litigation as a last resort," said Angus McQuilken, student trustee.

"Litigation is costly and time-consuming, a drain on resources, and is not always the best way to resolve a problem, but you have to have it for cases that can't be resolved by other means."

McQuilken said the proposal for the system should be complete by

19 Palestinians killed after stone-throwing riot

JERUSALEM (AP) —In Jerusalem's worst bloodshed since 1967, police fired Monday on stone-throwing Palestinians at the Temple Mount sacred to both Jews and Moslems, and at least 19 Arabs died.

The shooting began after Palestinians hurled a barrage of stones from the mount onto thousands of Jews gathered just below at the Western Wall, or Wailing Wall, where the Jews were celebrating the festival of Sukkot. The wall is Judaism's holiest site.

The Arabs were apparently infuriated by rumors that Jewish extremists planned to march onto the Temple Mount, which is under Moslem control.

The bloodbath touched off riots in the occupied territories that killed three more Palestinians. A Jewish cab driver also was found shot to death.

Police Minister Roni Milo said 19 Arabs were killed in Jerusalem and about 140 wounded. Arab hospital officials at first said 22 were killed, then lowered their count to 18, with 125 wounded - lower than that given by the Israelis.

Milo said 120 Palestinians were arrested.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir expressed regret but insisted Israeli forces were blameless.

"We are greatly sorry about the blood spilled in vain," he said.

The single-day death toll was the highest since the Palestinian uprising against Israeli occupation began in December 1987, and the most deaths by violence in Jerusalem since Israeli soldiers captured the holy city's Arab sector in the 1967 Middle East war.

Arab reports said two Palestians were killed and 62 wounded in later rioting in the occupied Gaza Strip.

A 20-year-old Palestinian was shot to death in the occupied West Bank when he tried to grab a soldier's rifle, Arab and Israeli reports said.

The army ordered curfews in several West Bank towns and refugee camps to contain the violence.

Late Monday, the body of a Jewish driver, shot in the head, was discovered in his taxi near the Israeli Arab village of Abu Ghosh outside of Jerusalem. The national Itim news agency said police suspected it was a Palestinian nationalist killing but were checking other motive as well.

U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III said in Washington that Israel needs to "exercise restraint" in handling such disturbances. The U.N. Security Council convened in New York to condemn the killings.

Bromery said he received a call from the Weld campaign for information in order to write a position paper on higher education, which Bromery will see next week. Bromery said, "I'll know later if it's [Weld's position on higher education] real."

John Silber had also contacted Bromery, to talk about an education proposal which would triple tuition for students, giving all the revenue to the University.

The High Technology Council, an advocate of CLT, has issued a statement which ranks Massachusetts second among states for the amount of money spent per student. The Council quoted a Board of Regents report issued in 1987, which has since been outdated. Massachusetts is now 28th, behind Mississippi, in dollars per student. If CLT passes, Massachusetts will fall to 44th.

"We are not preparing for CLT," said Bromery, "because we don't know how to plan for it." However, he added, it would be "the end of public higher education as we know it."

November. The plan will be presented to the Board of Trustees in December.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, who had previously opposed any restoration of litigation rights, said limited litigation with "some restrictive tenants" could be used in this system when all other means of problem solving failed.

Madson said students would be able to solve legal disputes in this system without having to resort to litigation through mediation, arbitration, or University intervention, particularly in consumer protection or landlord-tenant cases.

"Limited litigation is a possibility within a system of diverting cases through alternate problem solving," Madson said.

Litigation rights were rescinded from Legal Services in August 1986 by the Board of Trustees. Madson rejected the limited litigation proposal late last semester. The proposal would not allow Legal Services to take legal action against the University, the Town of Amherst, or the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

"Our philosophy is we want to help students solve problems at the lowest possible level," Madson said. "Right now, the possibilities could be better integrated. Litigation is very costly in terms of time and money but should be there when we need it."

Campus community looks inward as CLT looms

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

With another round of budget cuts to the University of Massachusetts and a proposed tax rollback referendum by the Citizens for Limited Taxation that may further cut funding, faculty, staff and students alike have expressed concern for the future of the University.

Many said the long-term effect on the quality of life and education depends upon whether the referendum question passes.

According to Student Government Association President Natasha Diephius, the failure of Question Three would be a sign of hope that the citizens of the state will not let the University go.

"If CLT doesn't pass," Diephius said, "it will . . . be turning the tide of the conservatives and libertarians."

Student Trustee Angus McQuilken said if more people become involved in the movement to defeat the referendum, the question will be defeated.

"I think there's hope now to beat CLT," he said. "There's time."

While some academic departments, such as the journalism department, are not yet heavily hit, the cuts have had some effect on them. According to Nancy Hare, the department's chief undergraduate advisor, the number of students allowed to major in journalism has been capped at 328, purchase orders for maintenance contracts have been frozen, and three tenured professors have retired.

Hare added, however, these changes have not yet affected the department, and that, with new instructors hired, there will still be enough teachers, and enough courses, for graduating seniors.

"We haven't been directly influenced by the cuts yet," she said. "Funding should be fairly secure [for new instructors]."

The English department, on the other hand, has had to reduce its staff because of cuts. According to Ernest Gallo, scheduling officer for the department, departing professors and instructors were not replaced due to the cuts.

"I don't want to think about what will happen with these cuts," Gallo said.

Budget cuts, by causing reductions to student enrollment, have also affected trust fund-sponsored agencies and Registered Student Organizations, such as the Student Government Association and the Student Activities Office.

According to SGA Treasurer Karen Talbot, who served as SGA budgets committee chair during fiscal year 1990, the amount of Student Activities Trust Fund money available depends upon student enrollment figures. She said she originally estimated student enrollment would decrease from 18,000 fee-paying undergraduates to 17,280 students. Since then, Talbot said, enrollment has decreased more than she had anticipated. The trust fund has been forced to absorb $200,000 in annual full-cost charges and it may have to absorb other cuts as well.

"The trust funds have not been touched yet," she said. "The administration is looking to the trust funds for cuts or [financial] support."

Dr. Irene Carew, SAO director, said she has suspected the trust funds would have to absorb the other cuts. "Everyone's got to carry their weight," she said. "It's just the beginning for us."

Talbot said the higher costs that must be absorbed, the various expenses involved for RSOs to put on programs and the fact that the student activities fee, which funds the SATF, has not increased, has hurt the RSOs and their programming.

"Groups can't put on as many programs [as before]. Costs are increasing, but not their allocation," Talbot said. "We can't afford to give them more money."

Carew said that the CLT petition "could hurt us like it could hurt anywhere," and that cuts to SAO will further hurt RSOs. "We need a central office for RSO work," she said. "Groups need to come in with us to work on programming."

Talbot said one way the SGA has dealt with the cuts is by advance planning. "I think campus morale is at a low point now. We planned enough in advance so that we can have an extensive activities program and keep morale up," she said.

Still, there is concern about how the CLT referendum would hurt the campus. Gallo said whether or not the petition passes, the cuts to the University have already had a negative effect on the University's quality.

"Without the CLT rollback, it's a disaster. With CLT, it would be a catastrophe," he said.

McQuilken said that fiscal recovery for UMass depends upon whether or not CLT passes. "It'll take five years to recover under the current conditions," he said. "If CLT passes, it'll be well into the 21st century [before it recovers]."

As for whether she is hopeful about the future, Diephius said, "Of course. But it also depends on the citizens of the state and how they prioritize public higher education."

Officer on prowl for thieves

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

Thieves flock to college campuses since the pickings are ample. But police at the University of Massachusetts are spraying some pesticide: education.

Just before the school year started, Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson, perturbed by continual thefts committed against students, promoted Richard Besse, a 24-year veteran with University Police in to the Detective's Bureau to focus on crime prevention.

Besse, who has specialized in crime prevention for many years said his police experience led him into prevention.

"As a police officer here for so many years and doing the same thing over and over again my heart has gone out to the victim," he said.

"Oftentimes the victim is victimized more than once when the reality of the theft sets in — I see this especially when an heirloom is stolen," he said.

Besse said a little education and a "proactive" approach to crime can reduce thefts on campus.

"I believe in trying to anticipate and to recognize a potential crime situation," he said. "And once this is done we can initiate efforts to remove them."

Besse said one of the most basic steps students may take to thwart a thief is locking the door. He estimates that up to 90 percent of on-campus thefts are the result of an unlocked door.

"Unlocked doors are a key to a thief," he said. "What we see time and time again is a guy walking around a dorm looking for an unlocked door. When he finds one, he pops right in, swipes a wallet, for example, and then goes to the trash room where he dumps the wallet and keeps the cash. He then just moves right on."

While wallets comprise a large portion of campus thefts, Besse said compact disc players are this year's hot item. He said one step students should take is marking their property through Operation ID, an engraving service.

The program, which University Police have been using since 1986, involves engraving the student's Social Security number onto the object. If the stolen object is recovered by police, the student may quickly reclaim the good.

BOG approves amendment

By LAVINIA GAMMON
Collegian Staff

After two debate-filled meetings, the Board of Governors last week approved an amended version of the Agreement of the Fiscal Status of the Campus Center-Student Union Board of Governors that was submitted to them by the Student Government Association last spring.

This fiscal agreement dictates how much money will be allocated to the BOG per student and states some of the relationships the BOG, SGA, and Graduate Student Senate should have with each other.

According to the fiscal statement funding to the BOG will drop from $7 to $2 per undergraduate student and from $7 to $5 per graduate and Stockbridge student.

Much of the debate centered around Governor William Hewitt's amendment which would allow the SGA and GSS power only to ask the BOG to reconsider Board motions. In the previous fiscal agreement, the SGA and GSS had the right to ask the BOG to reconsider motions, as well as bring new motions to the Board.

The Board said they felt the SGA and GSS would have too much power over the BOG if they were allowed to present any motion to the Board.

Vice Chairperson Ed Corrigan said, "I feel the Board should retain its autonomy. The SGA and GSS should have to go through the governors before they present a new motion to the Board."

After 45 minutes of debate, the amended fiscal agreement was passed 12-2-2. This amended agreement will be sent to the SGA for approval.

In other BOG happenings:

- Fourteen new governors have been elected to the Board. Representing the GSS are Todd Bryda, Jean Russel, Mike Volmar, and Peter Kleschen. From Southwest are Ted Maravelias, Caroline Ghilani, Richard Brown, and Charles Delane. Beth Ptak is the new Orchard Hill Governor. Laura Silver will represent the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Association. Erin Melia is the new Central Governor. From the commuter area, Patrick Corrigan and Michael Hurley will serve as co-governors. The Third World Caucus's new governor is Shirley Ostin.

Police warn of scam survey

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University Police are warning students to be wary of a survey purportedly being conducted by sex researchers Masters and Johnson.

Several students have reported receiving such survey telephone calls in the past few weeks, but police have confirmed with Masters and Johnson that the company is not conducting a phone survey.

Police said a ruse such as this is seen on campus nearly every semester. Police said these researchers do not conduct any phone surveys.

Police suggest students receiving such calls hang up and notify them.

ARRESTS

- Jeffrey C. Nelson, 19, of Sterling, was arrested Friday evening in John Adams Residence Hall for being a minor carrying alcohol.

Besse said preventing campus thefts has taken on a special significance in the wake of budget restraints. He said departments and offices on campus are knocking on his door seeking crime prevention strategies knowing that if they are the victim of a theft there will be no money to replace the item.

MEET THE FUTURE OF CREATIVE THINKING.

Amiga doesn't just improve your work. It improves your thinking. Just working hard isn't enough anymore. Creative thinking is what sets winners apart.

The Amiga computer was designed precisely with that thought in mind. It handles routine tasks, then lets you get all the way to innovation and invention.

Whatever you can imagine, Amiga has the power to produce. Easily.

Its built-in technology is a major advancement in a computer of this size and price range.

With a mouse and simple icons, Amiga combines a full color display, full stereo sound, graphics, 3-D animation, video capability and text as no other computer can.

It has the power to run software sophisticated enough to manipulate vast amounts of data, as well as the creative genius to create the complete score for an orchestral composition.

We deliver today, what others promise tomorrow.

Amiga was designed to keep up with you, from schoolwork demands through career needs.

You'll find standard what other people make optional. As well as sophisticated technology that doesn't exist on comparably powered and priced computers.

Creative educational discounts make Amiga an easy decision.

The Amiga Education Purchase Program for college and university students, faculty and administrators, offers a wide range of fully loaded, specially bundled hardware systems, with a complete system starting under $700.* All include a one year limited warranty and AmigaVision.

The best way to make up your own mind is to try Amiga.

Stop by your Campus Authorized Amiga Dealer and get your hands on the future of computing.

Sure, some people buy what's standard. But we think you can make up your own mind, and choose your own best course for the future. After all, isn't that what college is all about?

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the author of each piece and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Editorial Policy

The Editorial Desk — currently staffed by editors who had no hand in devising policies of past semesters and in light of recent misunderstandings, confusion and misdirected attacks from all sides — announces its own set of policies effective today.

The Editorial/Opinion page welcomes columns, letters and cartoons from UMass and the rest of the Five College area.

The Editorial staff reserves the right to edit letters and columns for grammar, clarity and length.

Submissions must bear your name, local address and daytime phone number. This information is subject to verification prior to publication.

Anonymous submissions will be printed only at the editors' discretion. Letters or columns written under a pseudonym will NOT be accepted.

Letters should be no longer than 40 double-spaced, typed lines. Columns must not exceed 65 double-spaced, typed lines.

Letters and columns written in response to a previously published letter will NOT be printed, unless direct reference to the letter or its writer is deleted. Any exceptions will be determined solely by the editors.

The Editorial staff is not required to print all submitted material.

Submissions become the property of the Collegian and will not be returned.

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian, the Editorial staff or the University unless otherwise noted.

The Editorial staff is trying its best to honor the abovementioned policies. Any inconsistencies that might have already occurred have not been a malicious attempt at causing our readers further distress, but rather one directed at trying to improve the page while accommodating all sides. Mistakes are almost a necessary part of publishing a daily student newspaper.

The stupidity continues. . .

Meredith O'Brien

Some people never learn.

Barely two weeks after the Olsongate scandal (for those of you who have been living in a bubble, the Olson scandal occurred on Sept. 17 when a female reporter, who interviewed a New England Patriots' player in the locker room, was allegedly sexually harassed by several players who shook their genitalia in her face), a seemingly brain-dead coach for the Cincinnati Bengals ordered a female USA Today sports writer out of the locker room.

After all, Coach Sam Wyche maintained, the "guys" standing around in the buff should not be made to feel uncomfortable just because some "lady" wants to interview him. He just didn't think it was right. Really, he believed, how would these players' wives feel if these women saw their husbands naked?

Wyche, joining the ranks of Oliver North and Richard Nixon, apparently believed that he was above the National Football League's rules, above the law set in a 1978 civil suit case guaranteeing female reporters the right to obtain the same information and interviews in the locker room alongside their male colleagues.

The NFL, rightfully, slapped this ignoramus with a $30,000 fine while NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue strongly repeated the policy of equal access to the locker rooms, regardless of gender.

But wait, there's more.

When a female sports reporter from the Collegian went to ask University of Massachusetts coaches about their individual locker room access policies, the football coach curiously chose to recite a policy that no reporters will be allowed in UMass locker rooms in order to preserve the athletes' privacy.

"Nobody will go into the locker room," said Jim Reid, UMass football coach. "It's in the playbook. The press should be able to get the news out and conduct interviews in the press room."

Hmmmm, that's kind of strange. Prior to last Wednesday, this policy was not enforced, and only after Reid learned that a female writer would be covering Saturday's game, did he iterate this policy. Press presence in the locker room used to be no big deal.

Why the sudden rush to enforce policy now? Is it because there is a real possibility of women reporters entering the UMass locker rooms, whether from the Collegian or from other local media?

And after this female reporter graduates, will that age-old policy will be buried again?

Meanwhile, Athletic Department Dean David Bishoff is telling the public that there is no official University policy dictating who can or cannot go into the locker room. He simply stated that the individual coaches could determine the policy for their own athletic team.

Funny, I thought that no matter where you are, in the pros or in college, the law applied to everyone, that no one could randomly decide to enforce or not enforce policy, that there were such things as legal precedents, that players should learn to act matrely when interviewed in the locker room.

Maybe it was naive of me to think that once a case was settled, once a liberty was acquired, it could not be yanked away. Women, like many other groups, have constantly had to struggle to gain equal rights. It seems kind of senseless that a few people could turn their back on sexual equality strides and get away with it.

If it has been legally deemed that all reporters have a right to interview athletes in the locker room, in male or female locker rooms, so be it.

If some people have problems with the press being in the locker room altogether, then they should deal with the problem as a whole and not target certain people, certain genders or erratically choose to enforce certain policies.

Some sort of solid decision needs to be made.

I, for one, am sick of hearing about this locker room deal. In the whole scheme of things it is such a trivial issue, but equality and equal enforcement of policies are not.

Organizations support 'lifeblood' services

This is an open letter to Provost O'Brien and Vice Chancellor Madson:

"Lifeblood" services for women, minorities and others who have historically been denied access to higher education — and academic programs which address the history and culture of groups traditionally underrepresented in the curriculum — are central to the mission of this land-grant state university.

Therefore, protecting these services and programs from budget cuts must be among the highest priorities of this University. Current and future budget decisions shall not interfere with these priorities. Mechanisms must be established for affected faculty, staff and student groups to directly participate in all current and future budget decisions.

Editors' note: Due to lack of space, the names of twelve who signed this letter could not be printed.

Athletes deserve locker room privacy

There's much ado about women reporters being in men's locker rooms after athletic events.

It's interesting that one never sees or hears about men reporters (or any reporters, for that matter) being in women's locker rooms after athletic events.

In truth, no reporter should be in any athlete's locker room after a game.

Really, folks. Do you think it is appropriate that someone should be allowed to question you or a camera person put you on television broadcast while you are preparing to shower or use the toilet?

Let's stop such ridiculous, unnecessary Peeping Tom invasions.

If a post-game interview is granted, it should be conducted in some designated "press" area, and other team members or staff given the privacy of their locker rooms.

Column frightening

Nobody likes to be scared. David Erickson's column ("Shock Therapy," Oct. 1) scared me, but I was extremely glad it did.

Once you are in college, there is this so-called "freedom." Hey, it's great, right? You've got no parents to kvetch and moan about your homework, the dirty laundry piled on your floor or the two-week old sandwich stuffed in the back of your underwear drawer. You have no curfew now and can go out on weekdays.

Oh, and those college parties are the best, aren't they? There is no one to tell you that you have had a few too many drinks or that the guy you are going home with might not be as sweet as you think because everyone is as smashed as you!

Fun, isn't it? Sure, until you wake up the next morning. Are you the woman in Erickson's column? Could you be?

Erickson is not condoning date rape. His article is not about rape. It is about responsibility.

You are in college now. Don't let the freedom go to your head. You are a young adult, capable of taking care of yourself, so why don't you?

Anti-Jewish myths a double standard

I applaud Reginald Perry for drawing attention to the mass media's double standards in letting John Silber off the hook after his racist remarks about the residents of Area B in Boston, while correctly castigating Professor Griff for his anti-Jewish remarks ("You Can't Trust What U Read," Black Affairs page, Oct. 4).

However, I am both saddened and angry that Mr. Perry used the same column to take a few dirty jabs of his own at Jewish people.

Mr. Perry writes: "The American media system is set up so that White persons in positions of power can say virtually anything they want, to anyone they want and get away with it. When a Black man stands up and attempts to do the same thing, he is crucified."

Firstly, if by "White persons in power" Mr. Perry is referring to people like Silber, a man who was denounced as a "racist and a Nazi" by Roxbury residents, it makes no sense to me why anybody would try to emulate such persons.

Secondly, I could not help noticing that Mr. Perry had reached into the deep and murky well of anti-Jewish myths and pulled out two winners: the one about Jews being responsible for Christ's crucifixion (a deed tantamount to the cardinal sin of deicide), and the other about Jews controlling the media.

The rationalization that Mr. Perry made an unfortunate choice in his use of the term "crucified" was quickly dispelled when, in the same column, Mr. Perry writes: "In reference to Public Enemy, I had to sit and watch Chuck D. take a media "lashing."

You may choose to hide behind Spike Lee's claim that Black people cannot harm Jewish people as a people.

But I hope you are also aware, Mr. Perry, that you have just become the most recent perpetrator of myths that have caused untold numbers of the same Jewish people to be massacred over the last two millenia.

Celtic's radio voice retires

Johnny Most leaves courtside after 37 years

BOSTON (AP) — Veteran radio announcer Johnny Most, whose gravely voice became a legend to generations of Boston Celtics fans, has retired from the broadcast booth.

Most, who called the play-by-play for 37 seasons from "high above courtside" in Boston Garden, said he would forgo a 38th year due to ill heath. He underwent a triple bypass operation last year that forced him to miss most of the 1989-90 season.

"It is only because of my heath that I am forced to to this," Most said Monday. "Unfortunately, I am no longer strong enough to do play-by-play or color."

Most, 67, will not completely relinquish the microphone. He will host a five-to-seven minute Celtics pregame show on WEEI Radio this season called the Johnny Most Show, the station said.

Celtics officials also announced that a banner in Most's name would be hoisted to the rafters at Boston Garden, near the broadcast booth, at a game against the Seattle Supersonics on Dec. 3.

"Johnny Most is truly a Celtic, always has been, always will be," Celtics President Red Auerbach said. "He is informative, colorful, humorous and loyal, and he's been a part of all the banners hanging in Boston Garaen."

Most joined the Celtics in 1952 after announcing New York Knicks basketball for two years. He also has done pregame and postgame shows for the New York Yankees and broadcasts for the New York Giants baseball and football teams and the Brooklyn Dodgers.

But Most's enthusiasm was saved for Boston.

He would scowl when he thought that players on the court were "fiddling and diddling" and will forever be associated with the words "Havlicek stole the ball," a description of the final play of the April 15, 1965 game against Philadelphia.

The famous voice was made more coarse by cigarettes and coffee, which Most occasionally spilled in his own lap reacting to a play, but without an interruption in the banter.

Most will be replaced by Glenn Ordway, his partner for the last nine years. Dough Brown, a morning sports anchor on WEEI, will serve as color commentator. Ordway and Brown handled the same duties last season.

My letter to Che; world revolutionary hero

Upon hearing your battle cry last night I unhesitantly reached for your rifle only to discover instead my pen, still but eager, between my fingers. As I stared down at a piece of paper which sat atop a calendar it suddenly struck me amidst my own state of semi-consciousness that today marks the 23rd anniversary of your assassination — intellectually perpetrated by the U.S. — under the skies of Bolivia.

The night no longer transpired a sense of peace, the moon was no longer in sight, your cries provoked the most abysmal hatreds in me and your rifle no longer was still between my fingers. As I wrote, a gush of wind forced itself through my window turning pages of books indiscriminantly and as if satisfied, it ceased at once.

As I looked about for a moment, this letter appearing in one of these pages became an inspirational source last night. From the writing and speeches of Ernesto Che Guevara:

To His Children
1965
To my children,
Dear Hildita, Aldeita, Camilo, and Ernesto:
If you ever have to read this letter, it will be because I am no longer with you. You practically will not remember me, and the smaller ones will not remember at all.

Pathfinder Pacific and Asia books

Ernesto 'Che' Guevara . . .

Your father has been a man who acted on his beliefs and has certainly been loyal to his convictions.

Grow up as good revolutionaries. Study hard so that you can master technology, which allows us to master nature. Remember that the revolution is what is important, and each one of us, alone, is worth nothing.

Above all, always be capable of feeling deeply any in justice committed against anyone, anywhere in the world.

This is the most beautiful quality in a revolutionary.

Until forever, my children. I still hope to see you. A great big kiss and a big hug from Papa

Elliot Monteverde

My heart cries out.

Little is still known about you throughout the world, about your ideals, your contribution to the Cuban Revolution of yesterday and today. However, my pen, like your rifle, knows nothing of schedules and silentness. It's possible also that tomorrow when I reach for your rifle to denounce atrocities or injustices, I might grasp indeed your rifle — perhaps never to let go.

Che, your memory lives in me and in countless people throughout the world. Your life and struggles were not in vain!

Hasta luego!

New WORLD Theater premier

21st Century Groove by Alonzo D. Lamont will be premiered by the New WORLD Theater October 12-14 in Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts. 21st Century Groove was the winner of the James Baldwin Awards for Playwriting, a national playwriting contest which commemorated the New WORLD Theater 10th Anniversary in 1989. The play was the First Prize winner of four plays which were given awards for excellence.

21st Century Groove is Lamont's eighth play. His other works include That Serious He-Man Ball, The Black Play, and Vivisections from the Blown Mind. His plays have been produced by several theaters including Jomandi Productions of Atlanta, the Lincoln Center Out-of-Doors Festival, and the American Place Theater, and was featured at Atlanta's 1990 National Black Arts Festival. He has also been published by the Theater Communication Group's Play In Progress series.

21st Century Groove incorporates video as a theatrical device and as a means of commenting on contemporary society. The play centers on a young African-American woman in a state of emotional crisis. She is torn between the individualism of her generation and the conflicting views of how her family and society define African-American identity and culture. The play uses video in an interactive capacity; the video screen becomes an additional character as well as a vehicle for transmitting information.

Ironically, or perhaps appropriately, the author of this work, which examines the impact of media in contemporary society, is currently employed as a writer for televison. Lamont resides in Los Angeles, Calif. where he is a writer for the popular television series A Different World. In a recent interview he commented, "I'm looking forward to seeing 21st Century Groove. It has really evolved from its first reading; it's now a very different play. Technological aspects aside, this play intrigues me because it asks 'How do we enter into our heritage — or is that heritage just assumed?' The central character is at a point in her life where she is assessing her individualistic choices and concerns without regard to the larger 'whole' she belongs to."

Despite his work in writing for television, Lamont's first love remains theater. "All the writers out here would really rather be playwrights — the theater offers a greater freedom. It's certainly more comfortable being a TV writer and you do develop a clearer focus but I still love the energy of live performance and that you don't have to package a story into 20 minutes."

The production will feature the work of two Massachusetts guest artists. The director, Ingrid Askew, is no stranger to New WORLD Theater, having been a New WORLD Theater Ensemble member while attending UMass in the mid-1980s. Videographer Aukram Burton of Boston is making his New WORLD Theater debut. The development of this project was supported in part by a grant from the Massachusetts Cultural Council's Program of Cultural Pluralism.

On the subject of labels

Can we talk about names? No, not names — labels. Specifically labels for people who are from any background except European.

I am tired of opening a paper/magazine/journal/book and seeing the words "people of color."

What does that mean? You folks remember your grammar lessons, right? "People of color" is just a faintly sophisticated way of saying "colored." If you want to say colored, why don't you just go on and say it?

Ayo Shesheni

Of course, people of color is preferable to minorities, seeing as how the folks being referred to definitely do not comprise a minority of the population of the world and are ceasing, collectively, to be a minority even in the U.S. Sure you can say the term is a political one. Okay, so I have no logical argument to combat that one. (Other than to ask, in a truly democratic state would we be referring to minority people or minority views?)

What about Third World? Now there's a term to pluck one's nerves. If anything, these non-European folks we're trying to find a label for should be called First World, since they were first to exist at all, and built the first "civilizations" and spoke the first word — at a time, by the way, that Europeans were still grunting and hitting each other with clubs, since they had not yet had the opportunity to externalize their brutalization.

Yeah, yeah, I know. The classification of countries by "world" is an economic categorization, referring to the level of success in the exploitation of other peoples and lands, and under this definition, Euro and Euro-descended powers are definitely first. So that leaves out First World. I don't favor the term anyway. It reinforces this society's proclivity towards putting everything into a hierarchy, with the implication that this is an inherent assignation rather than a result of manipulation.

What is the point of labels anyway? If we are attempting to identify people as non-White, why not just do so? Some argue that this implies that "White" is the norm. But do not the rest of the terms imply that anyway? Generally race — in the press, in historical texts, everywhere — is only identified when the person in question is not White. And since the terms mentioned above do not include any specifics of origin, they only confirm the non-Whiteness.

Let's go to logic. Anyone take logic? What is a dog? An animal, right? But an animal is not necessarily a dog. Stay with me now. We don't go around referring to all animals which are not dogs as "animals of no bark" do we? No. We say animals. So essentially, instead of saying "Third World" "colored," ALANA or any of those other not-necessarily-so-polite ways of designating non Whites, we should just say people. And for the exception, we can specify — White people. I conclude:

Whereas the majority of the world is "of color;" the minority must be "without color," and Whereas:

Euphemisms are a favorite device of the minority,

Thereby: it is decreed that henceforth the minority people of the world shall be called hueless and all others shall be referred to as aforementioned — people.

Cuba, the media and the fallacy of the New World Order

"Now, when I look into the depth of my soul, I can only perceive a portion of blue sea, and far away a white Latin sail, as a wing in flight. Where will it go? Where? Where?"
Eugenio Astol, translated from La Democracia, February 19, 1907

Today, there is a homogeneous media notion that the political and social transformation enveloping Eastern Europe is creating a "New World Order." Underneath such distortion there are unfavorable effects of this New World Order on the Third World. Inevitably, this is the result whenever an attempt is made by a Third World Nation at intromitting the present repertoire of the world system.

One such nation to intromit the world system is Cuba. On Sept. 25, 1990 Cuba was the only nation of the U.N.'s Security Council to vote against an aerial embargo of Iraq (Cuba opposes Iraq's annexation of Kuwait). Overall, Cuba opposes the military solution to the Middle-East crisis.

Similarly, Cuba opposed the New World Order last December when Fidel Castro publicly confirmed existing differences between new Soviet and Cuban policies resulting from the New Order.

Already, perestroika and glasnost, eloquent but deceitful concepts whose theories lie within capitalism, have plunged Cuba into an unknown dimension. The continuing disintegration of the socialist bloc along with the adoption of capitalistic reforms, giving preferential treatment not to poor countries but those with hard currencies, sets the stage where intransigence and resistance are the determinant factors of whether Cuba is to continue its sail on the path of socialism.

Elliot Monteverde

Cuba is about to enter the most difficult stages of a revolution that began almost 30 years ago. From the Cuban perspective, perestroika, glasnost or New Order is analogous to an economic and social isolation. This in turn signifies another stage of innovative evolution of the existing concepts and ideals of the revolution adapting to the present.

Three decades ago Cuba faced similar circumstances only to emerge, in spite of a U.S. embargo since 1962, as one of the world's leading nations. Indeed, some of the achievements in Cuba renegate the United States and its Western allies to a mere back seat. For instance, in Cuba famine has been obliterated, health care and education are free and accessible to everyone, infant mortality is about the same as in New Zealand and Israel, no one is homeless, violent crimes rate among the lowest in the world and drugs are, in relation to developed countries, almost nonexistant.

Thus, from a Third World perspective the repercussions of the implementation of such New Order concepts could be simply catastrophic. From this point of view, such events can no longer be perceived idealogically but racially. In analyzing the recent events in this fashion, Third World people have little alternative but to rise up violently and unhesitantly against the oppressors of the North.

Already the symptoms of this cancer might be detectable in the Middle-East crisis where the alliance of countries is essentially a White one. Nonetheless, Cubans, as Fidel Castro stated, will remain "on the true path to socialism" even if this means to do so alone. Without the moral and economic support of the Soviets, in addition to domestic discontent, this will be a difficult but not impossible task.

Cuba remains the leading mentor of revolutions of the oppressed people of the world today and in recognition of this alone, Cuba and in particular its people will difficultly ever bow to the North. Cuba's sails will be toward freedom, nothing less.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) New procedures result from a closed-door meeting. You find the right answers in an emergency. Fresh approach helps to resolve financial difficulties. Some communicators may be delayed.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Your mate or partner gets news that could increase your happiness. Although your co-workers are cooperative, you may prefer to move forward on your own. Rest will mend frayed nerves.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Your knowledge of an important subject could be tested. You are able to communicate effectively with higher-ups. Discretion will strengthen a promising personal relationship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Previously closed doors open to you now. Partnership or legal affairs could be involved. You make the most progress when you work calmly and efficiently. Children influence your evening plans.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Your money situation improves, but you may still have to limit your spending. A member of the opposite sex boosts your confidence. You make overdue changes and reap wonderful new benefits.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Someone's indecision could slow you down now. Reach beyond an apparent limitation; do not take rumors seriously. Maintain your sense of humor. A gentle answer turns away criticism.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Cut loose from the past and focus on building a strong financial foundation. New starts and contacts are favored. Refuse to be kept on a string by a member of opposite sex. Be proud.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) At work, take on the tasks you can do best. Real estate ventures are worth investigating, but you will have to strike a hard bargain. Diplomacy is your strongest ally on the home scene.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Keep your valuables in a safe place and stick to routine work. Protect profits by using tried and true methods. Gossip may be rampant. Ignore it! Home is the best place to relax.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) You may be delayed this morning by a problem involving a family member. The key to greater business success is having a variety of projects. Study alternatives.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Your finances may be sensitive if you are self-employed. Avoid putting all your eggs into one basket. Brooding over past mistakes is a waste of valuable time.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Your co-workers could act contrary today. Concentrate on work you can handle alone. Review financial figures, especially where taxes are concerned. Someone may try to make you a scapegoat.

Suzanne Vega brings her introspective vision to the Valley

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

Suzanne Vega has evolved into one of the clearest, purest voices of the 90s. She's moved forward, separating herself from the "new folk artist" genre she helped to create during the early 80s; she is a musician who delves deep into the waters of our subconscious, who turns her innermost self into music.

She went to New York's High School of Performing Arts as a dance major, but realized quickly that it was music that was in her heart. It was seeing musician Lou Reed perform that transformed her outlook.

"Suddenly I started feeling that I could be experimental," she recalls. "You could write a song with no chorus or melody. I felt like all the restraints were taken off."

She started out writing and performing in church coffeehouses and folk clubs around the New York City/Greenwich Village area. In person she may have been shy and withdrawn, but onstage she was able to "let go" and relish in the sheer joy of singing for any who cared to listen.

Vega's songs are like poetry readings accompanied by a very polite folk/rock band. Her crystalline voice is the focus of attention; the sparse arrangements are meant to enhance the words rather than overpower them. Each verse lands quietly and carefully, timorously, yet with firm inflection.

Days of Open Hand, Vega's most recent effort, is the most cathartic of her career. She focuses on dreams, both conscious and subconscious, about return and reconciliation.

"One thing that happened between the last album and this one is that I made contact with my biological father," Vega explains. "I hadn't seen him since I was a baby. There was a sense of coming to terms with that, with where I come from physically."

Through her father, Vega also came to terms with her musical roots.

"I also found out my grandmother had been a musician in an all-girl band in the 30s and 40s," she says. "Knowing that story made me trust my own blood. It gave me confidence. Before I felt it was just instinct. Now, I know music is in my blood."

Suzanne Vega will be appearing at John M. Greene Hall tonight at 8 p.m. The show is sponsored by the Smith College Rec Council and tickets are $13 for Smith Students, $15 for the general public.

At the Horse: Pylon prove themselves again

By ANDREW BROADHEAD
Collegian Correspondent

Pylon
Iron Horse
Sunday, Oct. 7

Pylon is the kind of band you'd want to play at your birthday party. I mean, if they can get people at the Iron Horse dancing for two-thirds of a 75 minute set, imagine the fun they could have in your living room.

Hailing from Athens, Georgia, Pylon formed just before that town had become a firmly established center for guitar pop-like R.E.M., the B-52's and Gang of Four, but without being a derivative of any of these, Pylon established themselves early on with several great dance tracks. However, they quickly decided their interests were elsewhere and disbanded.

After a six year hiatus, last February found them in the studio with producer Gary Smith (Pixies, Chills, Throwing Muses). The result was Chain.

Employing the standard line-up of drums, bass, guitar and vocals, Pylon is able to deliver the kind of urgent momentum and tension that lesser bands only dream about. Curtis Crowe's no-nonsense drums and Michael Lachowski's prominent thumping bass lay down a stark driving dance rhythm over which Randy Bewley's guitar jangles and picks. On top of all, this Vanessa Briscoe Hay's banshee vocals enchant the listener as she talks, mumbles and shouts her oddly juxtaposed lyrics. Mr. Crowe, asked to describe their music, once said it was "round with textured holes."

On tour to promote the afore-mentioned new album, the set drew heavily from it. Although still in a jittery rhythmic style, the new songs offer a little more emphasis on guitar melodies. Stand outs were the single "Look Alive," as well as the instrumental "B-Complex."

Interspersed amongst the set were various songs from their first two albums: Gyrate (1980) and Chomp (1983). The dance floor was pretty full and by the time everyone had recognized the jangly guitar intro to "Crazy," it was absolutely packed. (Thumbs up to the Iron Horse for having the foresight to move tables out of the way). It saddens me to think that younger members of the audience will go away thinking "Gee, what a good R.E.M. cover." They finished out their 17-song set with groove renditions of old party favorites "Volume" and "Feast on my Heart."

Choosing to play their dance club staples "Cool Dub" and "M-Train" for their encore, Pylon sent an already frantic dance floor over the edge. They then winded down with two less familiar songs from their new album.

Seventy-five minutes of energetic bopping and swirling took its toll as a visibly drenched Pylon stepped from the stage. Grabbing towels, they stood by the door shaking hands, smiling and hanging out with anyone that wanted to. As I walked out into the night with a smile on my face, I realized I'd had a glimpse of the "Party out of Bounds" that Athens must have been in the early 80s.

Cuts limit weekend fun

BOSTON (AP) — Families enjoying the Columbus Day weekend were left largely to their own devices while searching for tourist spots that hadn't fallen victim to budget cutbacks.

Federal and state money problems have forced several parks, visitor's centers and historic sites to trim hours or close entirely this fall.

The Franklin Park Zoo in Dochester and Walter Stone Memorial Stoneham cut back to winter hours Monday despite big holiday crowds.

The annual "zoobash" brought 6,000 visitors to the Franklin Zoo Saturday, said Dr. Mark Goldstein, executive director of Metropark Zoos. Even with the reduced hours, he predicted 10,000 to 12,000 people would come to the zoos over the three-day weekend.

Both zoos will be closed if the state follows through with plans to cut the $2.9 million budget in half, Goldstein said.

With a budget stalemate in Washington, the National Historical Park Services closed its doors Saturday. That meant Boston visitors navigated the Freedom Trail without guides, discovered closed gates at the USS Cassin Young destroyer and missed the entire Boston African American tour.

Aline Forbes, supervisory park ranger for the Boston National Historical Park Services, estimated the visitor's center would have served 7,000 people during the weekend, if it hadn't closed.

For many, the obvious alternative was to head outdoors. Sunny skies and warm temperatures make activities like apple-picking and leaf-peeping popular. State police reported heavy traffic on the major highways, particularly those leading north to New Hampshire and Vermont.

Close to 500,000 people attended the Topsfield Fair by mid-day Monday, said Nancy Pache. She said the weather, a bargain basement entry fee of $5 and unusual events like the annual Pumpkin Weigh-Off contributed to this year's success.

"This is our 10th day of sunshine," she said Monday. "I don't know if that's ever occurred."

Arthur Brooks Jr., of Auburn, Mass., won the contest with his 470-pound pumpkin.

Some museums said the pleasant weather had its downside; smaller customer counts.

Gail Eaton, a spokeswoman for the Boston Children's Museum, said attendance was about 800 below last year's 5,600 for Columbus weekend.

"Hey, families don't go to indoor museums when the weather is absolutely spectacular," she said.

Football survives 'Rhode' test, butts URI Rams 16-13

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

To characterize the outcome of Saturday's University of Massachusetts-Rhode Island football game as lucky would not be too far off the mark.

"Sometimes you're better off lucky than good," said head coach Jim Reid, as was the case as UMass delivered the Rams a 16-13 deficit. UMass (3-0-1) completed its third straight victory, as URI (3-2-0) dropped its second straight.

Luck and time proved to be UMass' redemption when kicker Marco Gabrielli and holder Ron Blauvelt fudged a point-after when UMass had rallied to tie URI 13-all with 14:21 in the fourth quarter.

In the final drive of the game, UMass started on its own 32 yard line and successfully reached the Rams' 11. Blauvelt and Gabrielli attempted again from 28 yards out and the ball soared straight through the uprights with 43 second left in the game, to push UMass to the 16-13 win.

"The first time [the ball was bobbled], I panicked," said Gabrielli. "The second time I thought 'If the ball's not there, I'll wait,' but we connected and put it up."

The game became a tit-for-tat session when UMass initiated the scoring drive at 8:11 in the first quarter. Quarterback Gary Wilkos passed off and pitched back to tailback John Johnson and fullback David Mitchell to gain the 79 yards needed to set up a three-yard touchdown pass to Johnson. Gabrielli completed the PAT.

The Rams answered about one minute later when URI quarterback Kevin Neville completed a four-yard pass in the end zone to flanker Mike Rogers, creating a 7-up match.

Ram kicker Cassara connected twice for URI in the third quarter on 33 and 35-yard field goals, upping UMass 13-7.

"They were unpredictable," said Johnson. "We found their weakness and started working inside more."

UMass responded to the pressure twice in the fourth, with a 17-yard touchdown from Johnson and the final field goal from Gabrielli.

"Today we made them look good," said Ram quarterback Kevin Neville. "We've got to be proud of the way we played."

Field hockey splits

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team split its weekend in Pennsylvania, defeating St. Joseph's 4-0 on Saturday, and losing Sunday, 3-2, to Temple.

Saturday was a day of firsts for UMass. Elise McDevitt netted two goals, her first of the year, while Joy Blenis and Jean Salisbury each scored their first goals of the season.

Ninth-ranked Temple proved to be too much for the 10th-ranked Minutewomen. Jane Catanzaro scored twice to lead the Owls to a 3-2 victory.

Mara Frattasio scored her sixth goal of the year, and Kerri Fagan added one, but it was not enough as Temple went on to win the game.

Soccer teams split weekend results

• Reds shutout UNH, 2-0

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Two goals in the last 10 minutes helped the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team beat New England rival New Hampshire Saturday, 2-0.

Beating UNH, which entered the game at 6-1-1 and ranked just behind the Reds in the New England poll, was a major step toward ending a "snakebitten" streak for UMass, said coach Jim Rudy.

Since beating California-Berkeley on Sept. 15, UMass had won just once. Saturday's win improved UMass to 5-4-1, and keeps the Reds near the top of the regional scene.

UMass is scrapping with five or six strong teams in the area, including Connecticut, Brown, Hartford, UNH, and Vermont for a playoff spot, said Rudy. "We're still in it, we have a good chance," he said.

The Reds outshot UNH 19-7 and forced freshman goalkeeper Molly Kirchner into making 13 saves. The Wildcats mustered just one shot on goal in the second half against sophomore Skye Eddy.

"We really felt like we deserved to win. Our problem has been finishing. We minimized their chances and shut down their goal scorers. Our midfield totally dominated about the entire game," said Rudy.

UMass took a 1-0 lead with 10 minutes to play. Lisa Mickelson sent a corner kick toward the top of the penalty area, where Holly Hellmuth jumped and volleyed the ball at the goal. Kim Eynard "came out of nowhere," said Rudy, to deflect the ball with her head into the goal.

Two minutes later, April Kater took a feed from Mickelson, held off two defenders, and scored to give UMass the 2-0 win.

• Minutemen tie URI, 1-1

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team kept alive its hopes of making the Atlantic 10 tournament by tying Rhode Island 1-1 in two overtimes Sunday.

The Minutemen, now 1-2-1 in A-10 play, nearly won the game with six minutes left, but Ram goalie John McGuire stopped a Dan Lawrence penalty kick to preserve the tie.

UMass had tied the game with 10 minutes left in regulation on Andrew Bird's second goal of the year. A scramble in front of the Ram goal followed a Peter McEvoy cross, and UMass midfielder Tom Novajasky eventually took control of the ball and shuttled it off to Bird, who blasted the ball into the net from close range.

"We played much better than we had the past three games," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler. UMass was "really dangerous," on offense said Gettler.

Rhode Island struck first, when Ric Martinez connected on a penalty kick early in the second half, which Gettler described as "pretty."

The two teams combined for 48 fouls and five yellow cards.

The tie puts UMass into a three-way tie for fifth place with Rhode Island and West Virginia in the Atlantic 10's latest standings. All four teams have 4 points, while fourth-place George Washington is only one point ahead. The top four teams make the tournament.

'We're still alive and vying for a spot," said Gettler of his team's tournament chances. "And it would really help our program if we were to get in."

The men's gymnastics team is looking for a manager/statistician. If if interested call coach Roy Johnson at 545-0815 or stop by Boyden room 248A in the morning.

Midnight Madness: The finals of an open three-on-three tournament will be played, for prizes, at Midnight Madness on Sunday, Oct. 14. Entries will be accepted today, Oct. 9, from 10 a.m. - noon in Boyden room 227. Both men's and women's teams may enter.

For more information, call Brian Gorman at 545-1794.

Intramurals: Entries for volleyball (men/women/co-rec) are due today, Oct. 9. Cross country and ice hockey begin competition Oct. 10. There will be a tennis players meeting at 6 p.m. Oct. 10. For more information call 545-0022 or stop by Boyden room 215.

UMass cross country teams stumble

• PC's Hendricken sets mark

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team finished third Friday in a tri-meet with Providence and Connecticut as Providence runner Geralden Hendricken shattered the UMass course record by more than a minute.

The final score was Providence 15, UConn 57, and UMass 69.

Hendricken finished the three mile course in 17:05; the former record was 18:13.

"She is in a class of her own," said UMass head coach Julie LaFreniere. "Hendricken is from Ireland and is one of the best runners in the country."

It seems the whole Providence team is in a class of its own. Ranked No. 4 in the country, the Friars swept the first six places and added an 8th-place finish to dominate the race.

"They are outstanding," said LaFreniere. "We just cannot compete with a team like that."

LaFreniere said she was happy with the performance of Kelly Liljebald, who finished 9th overall. Lilljebald, a freshman, finished in 18:19, almost a minute better than her last race.

• Men fall to UConn, PC

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

Prior to his team's meet against the University of Connecticut and Providence College on Friday, University of Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien knew that his team would be hard-pressed to compete against these two high-caliber, nationally ranked teams.

Connecticut, which came into the meet ranked fourth in New England and No. 20 in the country, scored 24 points to outdistance Providence, which came in ranked second in New England and No. 16 in the country. Providence, which was competing without its No. 1 and No. 4 four runners, scored 47 points to finish second.

The Minutemen finished third with 60 points. UMass came into the meet as the No. 9 ranked team in New England, and O'Brien had hoped that his team might perform well Friday and make other teams in the area take notice of the Minutemen. After the meet, however, he said he was disappointed by his team's showing.

"These are two great teams," O'Brien said of Connecticut and Providence, "but I'm discouraged that we were beaten so badly. I felt as though we should have run better. I thought we were ready to make a little more noise."

Connecticut's Andy Ball (25:23) took first. Senior Jon Corso was the first UMass runner to finish, in sixth place.

Equestrian team takes third place

By JEN FATKIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts equestrian team finished third and Mount Holyoke and Smith finished first and second at the Mount Holyoke Intercollegiate Horse Show on Saturday, in which 11 teams competed.

The UMass team was strong in the flat classes, where the riders are judged on their equitation at the walk, trot and canter (WTC) in a flat arena. Individual team members earned a total of sixteen ribbons in their division flat classes.

Five first place ribbons were awarded to Allison Devico (novice division), Michael Conway (advanced WTC), Rachel Williams and Melody McIlwraith (beginner WTC) and Theresa Krajewski (beginner WT).

Three second place ribbons were awarded to Kale Dewey (open), Elizabeth Guillet (novice) and Kristine Blake (advanced WTC).

The team received a total of eight ribbons, from third to sixth place, in the jumping classes, where riders are judged on their equitation skills over a course of six to eight fences. Fences range in height from 3 feet to 3-foot-9, and only those competitors at the open, intermediate and novice levels compete.

Vigil protests, mourns killing of Palestinians

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Correspondent

About 50 people attended a candlelight vigil protesting and mourning the deaths of the 19 Palestinians killed in a confrontation with Israeli police Monday.

The vigil, which was sponsered by the Palestine Solidarity Committee (PSC) was held on the Amherst Common.

"By gathering here," said Eqbal Ahmad, professor at Hampshire College, "we are affirming. We are affirming our humanity. We are affirming Jewish humanity. We are affirming Palestinian humanity. And that has to be done, especially in these times, when anger and hatred can take over."

The vigil began at 7 p.m., ending in silence about an hour later. Ahmad spoke to the crowd for about a half-hour.

"Word will get out there, I hope," he said, "by word of mouth, somebody will write a letter, some newspaper report may get picked up. People who are desperate, feeling isolated, fearful, will pick up pieces of information. I know this from experience. And you will be that piece of information that gives these people hope."

Some person were there to protest, others to mourn, said one of the organizers, a Hampshire College student and member of the PSC who asked not to be named.

"I can't speak for everyone here, but I believe we're here, not because we're going to make a political demonstration out of it, but because we're upset internally."

"There's an emotional void that can't be filled from standing here and watching the violence take place there, and from watching IDF (Israeli Defense Force) open up with live ammunition on civilians," she said, "so we just stand here with these candles and just mourn these deaths."

"If you're going to have a political rally, that's to achieve some end, that's to make some gain. The gain here is to let out our souls."

Others had different reasons for being at the vigil. Robin Varghese, 22, another member of the PSC and a UMass student, said that he was there to protest.

"We're basically here to take note that the Israeli government, not for the first time, ignored the rights, wishes, and dignity of their religious instituions and sects," he said.

Varghese went on to say that, according to the Palestinian accounts that he has heard thus far, the trouble began when the Israeli government ordered the crowd of Muslim and Christian Palestinians in and around the mosque, Al Aqsa, to disperse.

When the crowd resisted, the soldiers fired, Varghese said.

The crowd was at the mosque to defend it from extremist groups that were rumored to be on their way to destroy Al Aqsa.

"Every year on Sukkoht (a Jewish holy day), at least in recent memory, extremist groups call for it. You see the location of Al Aqsa is supposed to be the location of the first temple of Soloman. They call for the destruction of the mosque and the rebuilding of the temple."

Ahmad said he hoped there would be no need for another vigil.

Professor Eqbal Ahmad of Hampshire College addresses a candlelight vigil mourning the killing of 19 Palestinians by Israeli police at Temple Mount in Jerusalem on Monday. The vigil took place on Amherst Common last night.

Violence erupts in Israel

Jerusalem (AP)— Police closed the holy Temple Mount yesterday and fired tear gas after 200 Moslem worshippers tried to break through the cordon. Jerusalem's chief Moslem cleric was overcome by tear gas and carried away on a stretcher.

The closure came one day after riots on the Temple Mount, Islam's third-holiest site, in which at least 19 Palestinians were killed and about 140 were wounded by police gunfire.

Palestinian leaders in the occupied West Bank and the Gaza Strip have demanded U.N. protection and announced a protest strike beginning today, the start of the 36th month of the anti-Israeli uprising in the territories seized during the 1967 Middle East war.

Monday's violence forced the Palestinian question back toward the top of the international agenda. It was the bloodiest clash

Souter sworn in as 105th Justice

Court rules religious groups can access public buildings

AP File Photo

David Souter

Washington (AP)— The Supreme Court today left intact a ruling that says public schools that allow civic groups and others to rent school space can't refuse such access to religious organizations.

The justices, without comment, rejected the appeal of a Pennsylvania high school forced to rent weekend use of its auditorium to the Campus Crusade for Christ.

The action was announced the day David H. Souter became history's 105th justice, but he did not participate in the case.

Souter was sworn in a brief courtroom ceremony before all nine justices took the bench to issue orders in new cases and hear arguments in cases to be decided by July.

In another case involving religion, the court rejected an appeal by a small fundamentalist church in Evanston, Ill., that blamed its trouble finding a permanent home on a local zoning ordinance.

The court, without comment, refused to revive Love Church's challenge to the city ordinance.

In a third case, the court turned down the appeal of a Seattle church that says King County should have to pay it for blocking the use of church-owned land. It left intact a Washington Supreme Court ruling that a lawsuit filed against the county by the Presbytery of Seattle was premature.

In other cases, the court:

— Let stand a ruling that the constitutional rights of an emotionally-disturbed Texas boy allegedly beaten by his school principal were not violated.

Ronald and Nancy Fee, said Joseph Herndon brutally beat their 12-year-old son when he refused to submit to being paddled three times for misbehaving in class. Herndon and a teacher who was present said the boy was paddled three times on the buttocks and that injuries he suffered were caused by his thrashing about on the floor as he sought to avoid paddling.

Circumstances come to light in Olsen case

Editor's note: This is the fourth story in a multi-part series examining amateur and professional press/locker room relations.

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Since the initial thrust of news spread about what allegedly happened in the New England Patriots locker room to Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson, more paper in the sports sections across the nation has been occupied by the subjects and their respective stories.

NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue appointed Harvard law professor Philip Heymann to interview those who were allegedly involved in the Set. 17 incident. Heymann will report all findings to Tagliabue only. Tagliabue will relay all pertinent information about the investigation to the media when he deems necessary.

Olson maintained her account of that day has not changed. She is still at odds with Mowatt's account and has been told that the incident was staged. During an interview on NBC's "NFL Live," Olson said she has received death threats since the incident.

The FBI and Boston police have been informed of the threats and were reported to be looking into them. Olson has since reiterated her side of the story to Heymann and his staff.

Saturday's Boston Globe featured an article in which Couple offers to sell sons

MELBOURNE, Australia — An estranged couple has offered to sell one of their three sons, saying they need the money to pay bills.

Phillip and Judith Walther, who live in the small town of Moe in southeastern Victoria state, posted notices at a shopping center offering to sell one of their three sons: Benjamin, 21 months; Andrew, 4; and David, 7.

The family could not be contacted for comment yesterday, but Walther, 31, told a television interviewer Monday he "would have to get at least $15,000 for one of them" to repay his debts.

Victoria's Community Services department said it was undecided whether the boys should be taken from their parents.

Community Services Minister Kay Setches said the family's case was being assessed during discussions with the family.

"It is a matter of concern to me where parents are driven to a situation where they would make this offer, and what we want to do is ensure they know the degree of support that is available to them," she said.

She said it was too early to consider charges against the couple and called the offer to sell the children a "cry for help."

"When you look at the degree of pressure the family is under when they are in economic difficulties, they can be driven to make statements they might not want to carry out in a day or two's time," she said.

Iraq develops new arms

(AP) — President Saddam Hussein said yesterday Iraq has developed a new missile with a range of several hundred miles, long enough to strike deep into Saudi Arabia where tens of thousands of U.S. troops are deployed.

In another development, a study published this week said Iraq should be able to survive the U.N. trade embargo for at least another six months.

Meanwhile, the Navy searched yesterday for eight Marines missing since Monday. Search and rescue teams have located debris from one of the two helicopters carrying them, but no bodies.

Two America airmen who had volunteered for duty in the Persian Gulf crisis died in a jet air crash Monday in Saudi Arabia.

In other developments:

- A U.S. Embassy official in Baghdad said that a U.S.-chartered Iraqi jetliner today will evacuate about 350 more Americas and a unknown number of other foreigners from Kuwait.
- Prime Minister Toshiki Kaifu of Japan returned home from a week-long Middle East tour and said Arab leaders appreciated Japan's efforts in helping to solve the gulf crisis and the $4 billion in aid it has offered.
- The killings of at least 19 Palestinians by police in Jerusalem on Monday set off a barrage of Arab warnings and threats. Some Israeli opponents said the incident, which occurred when police fired on stone-throwers at a holy site, demonstrated the link between the gulf crisis and the Israeli-occupied lands.

The gulf crisis began after Iraq invaded Kuwait on Aug. 2. Since then, the Iraqis have massed close to 500,000 soldiers in Kuwait. The U.S. leads a multinational force that includes nearly 200,000 soldiers deployed in Saudi Arabia and the region to deter any further aggression.

Saddam has suggested that if negotiations are held to solve the crisis, that all regional conflicts, including the Palenstinian uprising in Israel's occupied lands also be placed on the agenda.

Iraq's new missile is called the al-Hijara, or Stone, Saddam said in a statement read over state-run Radio Baghdad and monitored in Nicosia.

"Al-Hijara became capable of reaching targets that are hundreds of kilometers (miles) from where it is launched," the statement said.

"They are the new missiles which Iraq invented," it said. "It is capable of reaching its targets from where it is launched, and there are many al-Hijaras in Iraq."

The statement did not give details on the number of missiles Iraq possesses or what kind of warhead it can carry.

The report on how long Iraq will be able to endure the U.N. sanctions, "What if Sactions Fail?," was by the intelligence unit of the Economist, a financial newspaper published in London. It concluded that sanctions could be damaging, but not before late next summer.

AIDS Awareness Week offers information

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

People putting condoms on bananas with their mouths, free dental dams, instructions on how to have safe sex — no it's not the set of a triple X movie, it's a table on the Campus Center Concourse.

In recognition of AIDS Awareness Week, the peer sex education class at the University has organized a table on the concourse which includes prize giveaways and contests. The week was developed in an effort to educate people about AIDS.

"It's surprising what the general public doesn't know," Chris Fox, a senior history major said. "Someone just asked me if you can get AIDS by kissing."

Fox said the table has been receiving positive feedback from the students. But added "they especially seem interested in the free condoms."

He said many students had taken a quiz on AIDS and tried to guess how many condoms are in a glass jar to win a trip for two to Provincetown.

Matt Richards, a sophomore psychology major, said it is very important that students learn the difference between safe and unsafe sexual behavior.

"People need to know that using a spermicide isn't enough," he added.

"A lot of people have misconceptions about AIDS, we've been answering a lot of questions," Brian Jewell, a junior communications major said.

Jewell said the peer sex education class is a two semester class that looks at issues related to sex and sexuality that works to educate students through workshops and programs.

The table was also distributing a "Safer Sex Menu" that consists of the following dishes:

Light Fare
- Dry humping
- Listening to music and/or dancing together
- Putting a condom on your partner

Entrees
- Petting with no clothes on
- Oral sex (fellatio) while wearing a condom
- Vaginal or anal penetration with a sex toy (no sharing)

Desserts
- Licking whipped cream or flavored nonpetroleum-based oil off your partner's body, except for unprotected body openings
- Masterbating while your partner watches or holds you.

Jewell said another frequently asked question was dental dam usage. A dental dam is a piece of latex used to cover the vagina during sex, he said.

Noelle Hogan, a teaching assistant for the course, said the workshops and programs that are conducted in residence halls have been "very successful" in opening communication about sex.

National Coming Out Day to be celebrated Thursday

National Coming Out Day will be celebrated at the University this Thursday with a number of events, including a rally and party.

National Coming Out Day originated in 1987 after the October 11 March for Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights when over 600,000 people marched on Washington D.C.

The term "coming out" or "coming out of the closet" refers to the process for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals of realizing their sexual orientation and learning how to tell friends, family, employers, and others when the need arises.

The Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance will celebrating Coming Out Day 1990 with day-long activities in the Student Union Ballroom. There will be a noon kick-off rally on the steps of the Student Union. From 12:30 p.m. to 6 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom there will be information tables, movies, videos, buttons, music and food.

In celebration of LBGA's 20th anniversary as a student group at UMass, a Historical Quilt will be started. Cloth triangles and markers will be available for people to write their names on; the triangles will be sewn together to form a banner which will become an annual way of recording the LBGA's posterity.

Walk-in rap group sessions will be held in the Campus Center from 1 p.m. to 6 p.m. for people who would like to ask questions or talk about issues surrounding sexual orientation.

At 9:30 p.m. in the SUB the LBGA will sponsor a Congratulations Party to celebrate all stages of "coming out" and the LBGA 20 years.

The LBGA has dubbed October 11 "pink and black day". Students are encouraged to wear pink and black to come out as gay, lesbian, or bisexual or to show support as a heterosexual ally.

Candidate states positions

Republican hopeful discusses deficit

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Andre Ryerson, the Republican candidate for Amherst state representative, said he is not running to launch a political career, but to curb the Democratic advantage in the legislature which has caused the state deficit.

"I am offended when going into the voting booth and only seeing one name on a ballot," he said. "Massachusetts is such a one-party state that Democrats have a 1 to 4 advantage in the legislature and have no competition to restrain themselves."

Ryerson said his first priority as representative would be to audit all state agencies and departments for an efficiency analysis. For example, he said the total number of consultants and other people paid by state funds has not been tabulated.

"In terms of spending, priorities have to be established," he said. "I would depend on the audit to determine where the state has been wasting money."

Ryerson said his proposed audit would include the University, which he criticized for installing a new phone system and hiring an outside consultant to raise funds campus during the fiscal crisis.

He said he would provide an incentive for University administrators to restructure the campus "bureaucracy" by allowing all money saved through reforms to remain on campus and not be sent to the state general fund.

Ryerson said he would consider a sliding scale system for tuitions based on parental wealth.

Ryerson opposes any tax increases during the current fiscal crisis.

"It is the wrong time to impose new taxes," he said. "The state's current fiscal disaster is the result of poor legislative judgement and unrestrained spending."

Ryerson said he can neither support or oppose the tax rollback petition, ballot referendum question number three, that would reduce taxes to 1988 levels in the middle of this fiscal year. The petition has been heavily criticized for the cuts a mid-year rollback would take from human services and education funding. He said he would not vote for or against the petition.

"The long term goal to return us to 1988 tax rate is not an absurd thing to aim for, but the rollback asks to do it instantly," he said.

Using the latest round of cuts implemented by Gov. Dukakis as an example of how the present government cannot determine what is wasteful spending, Ryerson said he did not think the legislature could make the right cuts if the rollback passes.

"Dukakis hasn't cut fat from the budget so far, he cut veteran's homes," he said. "I fear what question three might do in the hands of people who don't see waste. Even in the best hands, it seem obvious to everyone that you can't do this overnight."

Ryerson, a resident of Pelham, has never held an elected position. He has been appointed as a member to the Finance Committee of Pelham, the Capital Plan Committee of Pelham and the State Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Feminist's arrest protested

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A group of about 35 people, predominantly women, gathered last week at the bus stop facing the Northampton District Court to protest the arrest and conviction of self-described feminist activist Lisa Horan.

Horan was arrested in connection with a Nov. 18, 1989 anti-pornography action at Grampy's Corner Store on King Street in Northampton. She was found guilty on Aug. 21, 1990 of defacing pornographic magazines. Several magazines, including Playboy and Penthouse were defaced and damage was estimated at $47.50, according to police reports.

Holding signs and chanting "disorder in their courts," protesters held a mock court session and covered a flag with shredded pornographic magazines, spray paint, and glue to express outrage at what one participant, Lisa, termed "police harassment." Lisa did not wish to give her last name.

"It's zeroing in on feminists that are active and trying to silence them," she said. "Who's free speech is being protected, the victim's or the victimizer's? Why spend state money [to convict Horan] when people are raping?"

Cars, minors and alcohol

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

If underage students knew the penalties for driving a 21-year-old buddy to the package store for a case of beer, perhaps they would think twice.

Or so Philip Cavanaugh, associate director in the Department of Public Safety, would like to think. In 1989, as the University Police court attache, he dealt with more than a 100 minors in possession of alcohol at the Northampton District Court.

Cavanaugh said while ignorance of the law is not a defense, too often students in the Pioneer Valley, and especially at the University of Massachusetts, are ignorant of alcohol violation laws, which could result in license suspension if convicted.

He said students often are the victim of doing a friend a favor.

"Here's an example, I'm 21 years old but I don't have a car and I ask a friend on my floor — someone who is not 21 — to give me a ride to the store," he said. "The kid doesn't even go into the store."

Cavanaugh said if this student is then pulled over by police while he is carrying alcohol without the student's parents being in the car, the student will be arrested and charged with transportation of alcoholic beverages by a minor.

"When we stop this car — and we always stop the student for something trivial, like a headlight out — the officer peers in the back of the car with his flashlight to protect himself and there is the beer," he said.

Cavanaugh said the "real kicker" is that the student's friend is never arrested and goes "scot-free." The underage person is liable for more than $100 in fines and a potential suspension of the driver's license for three months.

"It's a hell of a price to pay for a case of beer," Cavanaugh said.

Another law students are often misinformed about are forgery or altercation of drivers licenses, Cavanaugh said. He said few students are aware that conviction of holding a fake license is a five year felony.

"We catch a student with beer and that's possession but then we find the fake ID," he said.

If convicted, the registrar of motor vehicles may revoke the an underage person's right to operate for one year and if the student was driving at the time of the incident, the registrar may also revoke registration on the car for up to one year.

"Not only does the registrar get your license for up to one year but the car registration may also be taken for up to one year," he said. "And the court does not care if it's your parent's car or your car.

"The student is going to such trouble to get alcohol and it is such a gamble," he said. "It's a five-year felony conviction and in most cases corporations will not hire such people."

Gayle Kielson, another participant, read a list of women who have been sentenced to life or several years in prison for killing their abusers.

"These women have much in common. They were all violently abused, were almost killed, and have no criminal record," Kielson said. "After the killing, done in self-defense, they cooperated with the courts. Did justice prevail?"

■ Olsen Case

Zeke Mowatt said he passed a lie detector test regarding the alleged sexual harassment of Olson in the Pat's locker room. The article mentioned the five-hour long questioning session which Mowatt "endured" as well as the qualifications of George Slattery, who administered the test.

Mowatt's attorney, Robert Fraley, said the passed test exonerated Mowatt. "NFL Live" reported Mowatt was considering suing both the Patriots and owner Victor Kiam. The Pat's did not comment, saying the case is in the hands on Heymann and his staff.

In other team/media relations, Cincinnati Bengals head coach Sam Wyche did not allow USA Today reporter Denise Tom into the Bengals' locker room after their loss to the Seattle Seahawks.

The crowd answered, "No."

Horan, who had originally planned to appeal the conviction, appeared in court last Friday morning to drop the appeal, but on the condition that the charges are dropped. She said will refuse to pay restitution.

However, the judge did not appear, and Horan said she walked out. This is the second time a judge has not appeared for a pretrial conference with Horan, she said.

"My decision to resist this has to do with talking to other activists," Horan said. "I'm taking a moral stand."

in Jerusalem since the 1967 war, and the highest single-day death toll in the uprising.

Arab leaders denounced the use of deadly force by Israeli police.

The European Community's executive body today also condemned the Temple Mount violence and called for new efforts to make peace. And Enrique Baron Crespo of Spain, president of the European Parliament, called on Israel to "cease using arms" and open peace talks with the Palestinians.

Moslem leaders said today's closure of the Temple Mount marked the first time police had blocked entry to the 35-acre site since Israel captured the surrounding Old City in 1967.

Also today, hundreds of masked youths threw stones at police in three other neighborhoods of Jerusalem, and widespread protests were reported in Israeli Arab towns.

HOUSING EXEMPTION APPLICATIONS

★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★

Frosh, Sophomores and Stockbridge students who wish to live off-campus for the Spring 1991 Semester should apply for an exemption from the on-campus housing regulation. Housing Exemption Applications are now available in the Housing Assignment Office Room 235 Whitmore. Applications are due no later than Friday, October 26, 1990. Please submit all applications to the Housing Assignment Office, 235 Whitmore.

★ IMPORTANT NOTES: Please read carefully ★

★★ The Exemption Committee will only meet once This is the only opportunity you will have to apply for off-campus permission for the spring 1991 semester. Please, make sure you apply in time.

★★ Signing a lease is not valid grounds for receiving an exemption from the on-campus housing requirement. DO NOT SIGN A LEASE UNTIL YOU RECEIVE AN EXEMPTION. Any student who signs a lease without prior approval from the Housing Assignment Office is responsible for all on-campus fees and will be required to live on-campus.

Thank you

UMass: The good ol' days

In my senior year, I've become quite nostalgic.

I remember what UMass used to be like, just three years ago. About 75 percent of the student population of UMass was not here my freshman year.

For those of you who fit this category and are still reading this, let me give you a little history lesson: UMass History 101 — Then and Now.

Mark B. Adler

In September 1987, the campus looked different. There was no Visitors Center, and Undergraduate Admissions was in Whitmore; Gorman House was a wreck; the Polymer Science building was a lawn; and the Isle of Ewe was accessible from both ends.

I've changed immensely, too.

I was a math majcr, drove a VW, voted Republican and ate a lot. I was in love. I couldn't juggle, write a paper or name all the U.S. presidents in order. My roommate provided the carpet, fridge and stereo. I respected the RAs. I didn't have a job, any Beatles albums or a good GPA.

I remember when the Newman Center had cigarettes; AT&T ran the dorm phones without Personal Security Codes; and BKO had some really nasty parties. We painted our doors, enjoyed co-ed bathrooms, and my RA bought me beer.

But the upperclassmen were recalling the "World Series Brawl" the previous October: the Mets beat the BoSox and several Black students in Southwest were also beaten in the near-riot that followed.

By February 1988, discontent among students of color for the administration's poor handling of another racial assault case led to a takeover of the New Africa House.

Takeovers were nothing new to UMass. The previous year some buildings were invaded by students led by Amy Carter and the takeover guru himself, Abbie Hoffman. In later years, students took over Morrill, the Grad Tower and Whitmore to protest research for the Department of Defense.

Back in the spring of 1988, the Massachusetts Miracle was still supporting UMass and Dukakis was running for president. We were all excited.

But soon after his defeat in November, we learned that the Miracle was a fake and we might have up to $5 million cut from the UMass budget. Only $5 million.

We should have been so lucky.

Since then the main job of the Student Trustee has been to lead the fight against budget cuts. The students erected "Cutback City" by the Student Union, and the library put up a billboard, crying out for funds.

We have a hiring freeze, a spending freeze, a severe drop in enrollment and a decline in prestige.

Our teachers have reluctantly become political. They wear GEO buttons saying "UMass works because we do" and preach "Vote No on 3."

I don't blame them.

I used to be so proud of the school that I freely chose over a more famous college, and I was sure that its prestige would get me into a good grad school.

Now, I wonder, "Will I get my class? Will my department be shut down? Can I graduate on time?"

Despite all these changes in the University and myself, one good thing stays the same: the RA on my floor still buys me beer.

SAT's built-in bias

While reading the October 2 issue, I found myself agreeing with Thomas DeFreitas' column, "The Virtues of Academia." He made a valuable point regarding students' attitudes about education. I agreed with his proposal that the federal government spend less money on defense and more on education. He had me on his side throughout the column, until the last paragraph.

Assigning roommates by SAT score? Surely, everyone, including Mr. DeFreitas, is by now aware of the growing controversy over these tests. The question of whether or not these tests are an accurate measure of intelligence has been in debate for some time now. Are we to use such a dubious test of intelligence to assign roommates?

It has been argued that the SATs contain built-in biases against women and minorities. It has been proven that they are not necessarily correlated with grades. Studies have found that the tests bear little relevance to intelligence and performance in school.

High scores on the SAT aren't a sign of intelligence, they are a sign of how well the student can beat the test. SAT courses don't teach math and verbal skills, they teach students how to outsmart the test — what kinds of tricks to use to solve math problems and how to eliminate incorrect choices to come up with the right one.

Furthermore, this test doesn't measure whether or not the student will take college seriously. It is possible that students with above average SAT scores may still spend all their time "living for the next keg party."

Even if we did have a test that could accurately measure intelligence, would assigning roommates by these tests ensure happiness? Or, more importantly, would such a system guarantee "an atmosphere in which there are no hindrances to education?"

I'm sure that there are students with SAT scores as high as Mr. DeFreitas' who play music too loud, leave the room a mess and snore. Good rapport between roommates cannot be ensured by an intelligence tests, and especially not one that has been proven inaccurate on so many counts.

This idea is elitist as well as ignorant.

If Madson only read newspapers

Students rallied and marched to Whitmore and left messages. Students, the people who this University is supposedly for, took action against further cutbacks to the Everywoman's Center.

So far, our benevolent patriarch, Dennis Madson, hasn't gotten a clue. Maybe he didn't read the messages. So, in light of this, I figured I'd dedicate my weekly space to him. Most people read newspapers. I certainly hope Dennis Madson does. You see, if Dennis Madson reads newspapers, he may know why the EWC is needed so badly on this campus.

Pamela McCarthy

Anorexia and bulimia are two eating disorders that wreak havoc on a woman's (it can happen to men, but let's face it, women are usually the ones who have it) mind and body. They can do nasty things to you, like hurt your chances of ever having a child, cause intestinal problems and rip your esophagus to shreds, not to mention the fact that it causes more emotional stress for the afflicted and their loved ones.

So what does Dennis do? He slashes the support groups for eating disorders. That's smart.

If Dennis Madson reads the newspapers, he may realize that sexual harassment exists. Maybe he doesn't care — after all, the chances of him ever experiencing it are slim, to say the very least.

But most women have experienced it to a certain degree. (And in case any of you were wondering, yes, I have experienced it.) Unfortunately, we have no place to turn to for support and advice. You see, that's not an important issue, according to our benevolent patriarch.

If Dennis Madson reads the newspapers, he may understand that there are women here, in this country, in this state and on this campus, that have concerns of pregnancy, date rape, violence and safety.

Many of us need the counseling that the EWC offers for these issues. Right now, he's claiming to make an effort to keep a rape crisis facility for us. How very generous. Obviously, Madson thinks the only problem we have is rape. Yes, it is the world's oldest sport. Yes, it is wrong, and any man who does it deserves to rot in hell. But it's not the only thing affecting us.

If Dennis Madson reads the newspapers, he'd realize that one out of 10 women are lesbian or bisexual. Quite a thing to deal with if you think you may not be straight. If it were me, I'd need someone to talk to. If it were a friend of mine, I'd listen, but let's face facts — I'm not experienced in coming out. The EWC would do a better job counseling these women than I ever could.

If Dennis Madson reads the newspapers, he knows that there are unique problems for women of color. Or maybe he buys the myth that Yankees aren't racist. Women of color have a two-ton cross to bear, charitably given to them by men and White society. They not only have sexism to deal with, but racism. Yet the Bridge Program, a program especially for women of color, is gone. Outta here.

Funny. It's our money they are messing with. We pay for this school through our tuition and our taxes. Obviously, we don't count, even though we are providing our benign patriarchs with the dough they are using for a new phone system and cable television. It is painfully clear where their priorities lie.

Not every woman will feel she needs the Everywoman's Center. But it is reassuring to know that it is there, that any woman who needs help can get it. We are citizens. We are students. We've paid this money through tuition and taxes. We deserve more.

Are you reading us, Dennis?

Whitmore should rethink its position on LSO and EWC

Have you ever noticed how much Whitmore looks like a fortress?

A friend of mine once told me it was built that way on purpose. She said that when it was constructed in the late 1960s, the designers deliberately modeled it after a medieval fortress.

Ted Chambers

This way the building could be easily shut down to prevent hordes of 60s radicals from taking over the chancellor's office every other week. I don't know if any of this is true, but it sounds nice.

Anyway, these days the need for "Fort Whitmore" has long since passed.

Once in a while they are still forced to lock the doors and sit out some minor student disturbance like the CIA protests in 1986 or last fall's student strike. But other than situations like these, things have been relatively quiet on this campus for the last 10 years or so.

In fact, lately the administration acts as though they want more student activism

After a decade of encouraging complicity and apathy, many administrators are apparently rethinking their position on student activism now that they are faced with the prospect of unemployment.

Some of the vice chancellors are even training students to be better activists.

They arm us with facts and figures about the budget and then herd us like sheep to Beacon Hill where we are supposed to act as their mouthpiece.

In return for this service, they balance their budget on our backs by raising our tuition and fees. And then, to add insult to injury, they refuse to deal with us in good faith on student issues like the Legal Services Office and the Everywoman's Center.

This summer the administration refused to return to the Legal Services Office the power to litigate on behalf of students, even after the LSO promised not to sue the University.

Some administrators are admittedly still bitter because of a multi-million dollar settlement that the LSO won for a student in 1985, who claimed that her civil rights had been violated by University officials.

The administration retaliated by taking away the LSO's powers to litigate on behalf of students.

For five years, the administration has been making us pay for their mistake.

With no legal recourse, indigent students have been vulnerable to greedy landlords and auto mechanics, sexual harassment and civil rights violations.

And now, because of the budget cuts, the Everywoman's Center has been all but eliminated, leaving women on this campus with virtually no support or counseling services.

In spite of this, though, students are expected to pick up the sword and fight to save the "fortress," which is now in danger of toppling from forces outside of this campus.

This semester there is bound to be a lot of activity on and off campus surrounding the budget cuts.

Students should refuse to participate until the administration is willing to deal with us in good faith.

Give us back the LSO and the Everywoman's Center.

Diversity courses combat racism

Gen Ed requirements increase awareness

By AL ARPAD
Collegian Staff

Many students at the University of Massachusetts approach their General Education requirements from a practical standpoint.

In order to graduate, every student must take a set number of courses carrying certain designations. Of these, the courses carrying a Diversity designation are perhaps the least understood and the most difficult ones to schedule. As recently as the Fall 1989 semester, the University was short of more than 2000 seats in Diversity classes, according to a Faculty Senate report.

Because many schools have no comparable designation, transfer students can face a particularly difficult time in scheduling their last year or two of classes, according to professor Ronald Reid, who advises transfer students for the Communications Department.

In addition, the University can be infuriatingly inflexible about Gen. Ed. requirements. In 1988, Norman Aitken, Associate Provost for Undergraduate Education, straightforwardly told a group of academic advisors that students should not try to substitute other courses for their Gen. Ed. requirements. "Appeals for substitutions will not be heard," he said, according to an article in the Campus Chronicle.

Why are the Gen. Ed. designations so important that they can't be appealed? How were the requirements arrived at? And can Diversity designated classes really improve race relations on campus, as indicated by the Faculty Senate response to the 1987 Hurst Report?

Understanding the General Education requirements, particularly those with Cultural Diversity designation, calls for some history. Educators have long carried on a debate about what to teach, arguing about what body of knowledge is so vital to understanding society, that all students should study it regardless of their majors.

The Birth of Diversity

Until the early 1970's, the University of Massachusetts Gen. Ed. list included two writing courses in the English department, one public speaking course, two courses in Western Literature, and distribution requirements in math, science, and the social sciences.

This system came under attack during the 1960s for several reasons. First, some students resented having to take courses they didn't consider "relevant" to their individual fields of inquiry. In addition, pressure was growing all over the country to diversify "the canon," an informal list of great works traditionally at the heart of a required courses of study.

Finally, the University was growing at such a rapid rate that even the residence halls could no longer accommodate the incoming students. Naturally, the programs which handled the basic courses were stretched to their limit.

In the early 1970s, university-wide graduation requirements were loosened. The 1976 Undergraduate Catalog called simply for "Core or distribution requirements, providing breadth to complement the depth of a major. Although these requirements vary from college to college, all schools require at a minimal familiarity with the theory and practice of writing and speaking, and an introduction to the humanities and fine arts . . . "etc.

> Educators have long carried on a debate about what to teach, arguing about what body of knowledge is so vital to understanding society...

In practice, the requirement of "minimal familiarity" varied widely between individual departments, with over 1200 different courses available to meet what were supposed to be basic requirements.

By 1984, the perception had grown among faculty members that "(the University) had lost control of the educational experiences of the undergraduate body," according to a 1986 Special Report of the General Education Council to the Faculty Senate.

With the formation of the General Education Council in 1984, the University undertook a complete overhaul of the required curriculum. But achieving control over the educational experience was more complicated than it sounded, because the University still had not resolved the basic question of what to teach. What eventually resulted was a compromise that "won the University of Massachusetts at Amherst recognition nationwide," according to the Council's 1989 Annual Report.

Many faculty members, mindful of traditional academic values, believed, as they do now, that the important effect of the Gen. Ed. requirements was the strengthening of academic standards through standardization of the core curriculum and a renewed emphasis on writing.

On the other hand, support for a diversification of the core curriculum was growing among faculty members who believed that the traditional canon excluded the intellectual achievements of women and of other cultures. Much debate ensued, but by 1986, the present system had been formulated and put in effect.

During the same semester, several Black students were beaten outside a Southwest residence hall. The incident which stemmed from the Red Sox' defeat in the final game of the World Series, called attention to troubled racial relations on campus.

> "UMass (should) develop educational programs which are designed to maximize student awareness of racial issues in America."
> Hurst Report, 1984

In response to pressure, coming mostly from minority students, the UMass administration commissioned what became known as the Hurst Report on the status of campus race relations. Frederick Hurst conducted an investigation and found that the violence at Southwest had been racially motivated, and that "the administration's historical denial of racial problems caused...the failure to predict and prevent the incident..."

This symbol, until 1987, designated human relations-related courses that enhanced the student's understanding of the dynamics of racism, sexism, anti-Semitism, handicappism, and other forms of discrimination.

The Report recommended, among other things, that "UMass develop educational programs which are designed to maximize student awareness of racial issues in America.'

The Faculty Senate response to the Hurst Report asserted that the Diversity requirement "addresses some of the issues and concerns raised in the Hurst Report . . ." and that "this area should be made a priority for curriculum development."

This priority development did not take place in a vacuum. While the University's response to the Hurst Report was seen by many in the media as a positive step toward better race relations, conservative columnists like George Will were decrying diversification of the canon across the country, calling it a "liberal indoctrination."

However, according to some students and faculty on this campus, the development of diversity-oriented classes at UMass has not been thorough enough.

The University found itself with a largely unprecedented set of requirements, said African-American Studies professor Michael Thelwell. "The logical extension of that is that the cultural and ethnic composition of the faculty will have to change dramatically," in order to provide individuals who can credibly and expertly address diversity issues.

> "It seems to me that, given the fact that the Commonwealth hasn't funded General Education, the faculty has achieved heroic results."
> Maria Tymoczko, Professor, Comparative Literature

The administration, faced with a deteriorating budget which threatens the security even of the present faculty, must find a way to meet the demand for the newly required courses, Thelwell said.

"(The University) starts to put together large lecture courses, and in many cases, that has resulted in a significant dilution of the intellectual and academic content, which is very ironic, because they (conservative academics) always said that Black studies would represent a kind of erosion of standards, which is a standard racist argument. But people are prepared to do that in areas of the culture other than Western culture . . . It represents a species of cultural condescension where it happens."

The General Education Council and the administration have gone to great lengths to prevent any erosion of standards, including the hard-line stance on substitutions. Every course must be approved by a subcommittee of the Gen. Ed. Council for the initial designation, and by a separate subcommittee for the Diversity designation.

However, virtually all the faculty members interviewed agreed that drastic measures have in some cases been necessary to implement the Gen. Ed. requirements, and that the Diversity component has been particularly difficult. The drastic measures employed were described as everything from "heroic" to "cynical."

Professor Maria Tymoczko of Comparative Literature, a former Chairperson of the General Education Council, said that "even in courses that didn't have the Diversity designation, we were seeing an increase in the number of diversity components offered.

"We were seeing a real shift in the awareness of the faculty as a whole on diversity issues, and that diversity was not only working for the students. It was working for the faculty as well. It seems to me that, given the fact that the Commonwealth hasn't funded General Education, the faculty has achieved heroic results."

Indeed, the Commonwealth has not funded General Education, and cuts have hurt all facets of University operations. But it is precisely this scarcity of funds that may have led to the potential for exploitation of the Gen. Ed. requirements, particularly in funding of Teaching Assistantships for graduate students.

Departmental allocations for Teaching Assistants in most departments, especially the humanities, have been cut to the bone. However, separate sources of funding are available through the Provost's office. They support certain necessary programs, in this case Gen. Ed. requirements.

Although most professors agreed that large lecture classes provide a relatively poor learning environment for students, several described departmental policies of offering large lecture courses in Gen. Ed. with the explicit (in one case "cynical") intention of securing additional Teaching Assistant slots with the available funding.

Most professors said their own departments would be extremely reluctant to take such steps, but a glance at the Schedule of Courses shows that large lecture courses are proliferating in Gen. Ed.

Robert Bagg, Chair of the English Department, described just such a dilemma. A decision to offer much larger lectures was made when the department "heard clearly from Norm Aitken and the Gen. Ed. Council that they would be welcome."

> "(The University) starts to put together large lecture courses, and in many cases, that has resulted in a significant dilution of the intellectual and academic content."
> Michael Thelwell, Professor, African-American Studies

All things considered, the Diversity requirement and the Gen. Ed. Program should probably be considered a success, given the adverse fiscal circumstances in which the University finds itself. However, the potential for an erosion of standards exists in some instances.

One Continuing Education instructor, asked if he had received any preparation from his department to teach a Diversity designated course, said only "Well, on a form I filled out at the Continuing Education office, they asked if the course fulfilled a Gen. Ed. requirement. I checked 'yes.'"

Although courses are reviewed by the appropriate subcommittees of the General Education Council every four years to ensure that they continue to meet uniform standards, no provision has yet been made to check the qualifications of other instructors when faculty changes are made or additional sections are added.

Despite any problems, the University has made its commitment to the Diversity requirement clear in at least one important way. When the Historical Studies and Lab Science components of the original Gen. Ed. proposal proved impossible to implement, they were temporarily suspended. The Lab Science class is not currently required, and only one Historical Studies class is required instead of the original two. No such retrenchment has been made with regard to the Diversity requirement.

But this could change. Professor Lee Edwards, Director of the Women's Studies program said that regardless of the administration's priorities, "if CLT passes, nothing will protect anybody."

Ministry's mayhem comes to life on vinyl

By PAUL DeGEORGE
Collegian Correspondent

In Case You Didn't Feel Like Showing Up Ministry
Sire

Just when you thought the world's most sinister band had reached an unsurpassable point of industrial aggressiveness with their last album, Ministry has returned to inform us that while The Mind is a Terrible Thing to Taste, it is an even more horrible thing to have force fed to you for 39 minutes and 48 seconds by two of industrial music's most maniacal caterers.

That's exactly what happens on their latest feast, In Case You Didn't Feel Like Showing Up . . . a live album recorded during their 1989-90 North American tour.

The album opens up with two songs from 1988's classic album The Land of Rape and Honey and then dives into an 11-and-a-half minute epic version of "So What," one of the best songs from the The Mind . . .

Review

It is generally agreed upon, by we slightly deranged and masochistic members of industrial concert-going culture, that Ministry delivers one of the most heinously wonderful live performances of any band. And even if you've never actually been to a Ministry show, you probably know someone who came home with a broken arm, bloody nose or some other treasured souvenir, and made you regret having never gone.

After all, listening to a Ministry album in the privacy of your own room is one thing, but the urge to destroy and smash one's body against things that arises from a high volume playing of any tune from Twitch (their first truly industrial and truly great album) to The Mind . . . is generally suppressed by the threat of a fine from housing.

Now we have the solution: In Case You Didn't Feel Like Showing Up . . .

Ministry seems more than happy and deftly capable, to transfer the power of a live show to an analogue tape and viciously invade your privacy — and sanity.

On this tour, Alien Jourgensen and Paul Barker — the two main founding members of the band — are backed up by a huge band to perform their best songs; which results in a ripping version of "Thieves."

The huge cast seems to function as a sort of orchestra from hell, and instead of that disappointing Depeche a la Mode-ish, live pre-recorded sound, Ministry attains a distinctly "live" yet overwhelmingly incredible sound.

The album builds in momentum and energy and finishes off with a nine-and-a-half minute "Stigmata" coup d'etat. This is by far Ministry's best song ever and it gains a sublimely sinister new life here, with Jello Biafra (ex-Dead Kennedy, and Lard co-conspirator) taking over the microphone to deliver an acidly hateful diatribe against just about everybody and everything.

So, in case you didn't feel like showing up, for whatever reason, you should definitely check out what you missed. It's the concert in a box that you'll want to attend again and again, until you lose you mind — or your neighbors lose theirs.

Falling Pieces of the Broken Sky
BY JULIUS LESTER
Brilliant, controversial, and tinged throughout with wry humor, this collection of essays charts the political and spiritual odyssey of acclaimed author Julius Lester during the past 10 years.
Julius Lester has sometimes been out of step with his times but never with himself. He was one of the earliest to proclaim the power and importance of black pride. He publicly decried black anti-Semitism in defiance of less reasoned voices. He sought racial tolerance when others urged violence.
Julius Lester is Professor of Judaic Studies at UMass

At The Jeffery Amherst College Store...
The Minimal Family
BY JAN E. DIZARD & HOWARD GADLIN
Almost daily we hear reports that the American family is collapsing. Widespread public concern has moved several administrations to set up commissions to study ways of bolstering the family, and a number of politicians have built whole campaigns around this issue. Responses to the apparent crisis have alternated between the extremes of nostalgic evocations of traditional ideals on the one hand and glib celebrations of selfhood on the other.
In this book, Jan E. Dizard and Howard Gadlin offer a new vision for the American family. They argue that we can no longer find refuge in an idealization of the nuclear family; we must recognize that our private welfare is inextricably tied to policies and actions within the society as a whole.
Howard Gadlin is Ombudsperson and Professor of Psychology at UMass.
Jan E. Dizard is Professor of Sociology and American Studies at Amherst College.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21 - April 19) Business opportunities abound now. Move ahead with greater confidence to make important deals. Refuse to let anyone interfere with your plans. The spotlight is on your ambition and prestige.
TAURUS (April 20 - May 20) Your personal finances should be looking up! News from distant shores could be the cause. Recognize your limitations as well as your strengths. A sense of humor is your best ally.
GEMINI (May 21 - June 20) Distant affairs are easier to handle today. Be more assertive about your professional plans. Others will gladly follow where you lead. Your charisma fascinates a member of the opposite sex.
CANCER (June 21 - July 22) Steer clear of difficult-to-please higher-ups or troublesome neighbors. Recent tensions will fade soon. New work programs prove interesting. Replace bad habits with good ones.
LEO (July 23 - Aug. 22) Someone may be trying to swim in two directions at once, not really knowing what they want out of life. Try not to dwell on an unkept promise. Seek new recreational outlets.
VIRGO (Aug. 23 - Sept. 22) False friends and "takers" leave a funny feeling in the solar plexus. Spend time with someone you can really trust. Think about embarking on a short period of training, study, or research.
LIBRA (Sept. 23 - Oct. 23) Once your mind is made up, there is no stopping you! Plant the seeds for what you want. Put your desires in writing after talking them out. Use private sources and inside information wisely.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23 - Nov. 21) Your own intuition is far more accurate than rumors or glorified reports. Certain individuals may be depending on friends instead of taking responsibility for their own financial security.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 - Dec. 21) Be patient if delays or obstacles arise in connection with negotiations. An either-or attitude could destroy good relations and block harmonious flow today. Schedule a business trip, and time out for TV.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 - Jan. 19) Take responsibility for your own mistakes and triumphs. Surround yourself with upbeat people! Seek prompt professional attention for any health problems.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20 - Feb. 18) Display your talents to best possible advantage. Group gatherings are highlighted later today. Rise above petty arguments. Emotional maturity is a must! Teasing someone could boomerang.
PISCES (Feb. 19 - March 20) Focus on an important personal goal. Get in touch with people who are highly placed. Financial extravagance remains a temptation; resist. Nurture a close relationship.

Apple, craft festival turns ripe with success

By MELISA CANLI
Collegian Correspondent

The strands of music drifting across the street and the aura of excitement on the Amherst Common made me quicken my footsteps toward the brightly colored tents of the vendors. Suddenly, I was surrounded by the smell of apples and the laughter of children — a commodity I miss at UMass.

The sounds were from the Third Annual Apple Harvest and Craft Festival on Saturday, sponsored by the Amherst Family Center and Atkins Fruit Bowl. Proceeds from the festival were slated to benefit the Family Center.

Pauline Lannon from Atkins Farms, one of those in charge of organizing the festival, said Atkins was approached by the Center three years ago when they were seeking support to organize such an event. The Center provides the Amherst community with a referral service and family counseling. All beverages at the festival were donated by Atkins.

Linda Carpenter, head coordinator of the event, is an advisor at the Center. She described the Family Center as a drop-in place for families with young children and said the focus of the day was children's games and activities.

"The whole event requires about 200 volunteers. They are composed of community and college residents. This [festival] can be seen as a tribute to all the volunteers."

The day's schedule was quite extensive. Andy Jaffee, Giselle L'Italien, The Pioneer Valley Jazz Society Sextet and the South End Jazz Band provided the music. Foot races, parachute games, a puppet show and a quilt raffle added to the day's enjoyment. Exhibitors, selected prior to the festival by jurors, were a mix of jewelers, wood carvers, those with art work, rubber stamps, porcelain, toys, silks and flags. More than 80 vendors spread themselves across the Common.

Carpenter was giving her half brittany spaniel, half Labrador puppies away for free. Reluctantly, I left the children who were pleading with their parents for a puppy, to glance at all the other happenings.

A miniature golf course was being set up early Saturday morning. One tent was a haunted house, another was the cavern of a fortune teller. Kids decorated cookies at one table, made sand art to take home with them and ran around from one table to the next, not caring whether they smeared the unicorns, rainbows and balloons painted on their bright faces.

In our sophisticated college world, we sometimes forget the importance of children and family. We interact so much with our peers that we forget how to talk to a child, how to enjoy our lives with the optimism and innocence we had as children. It was a treat to partake in the children's joy.

Thanks to the Family Center for providing the town and the child within all us college students with a great day.

Rick Mullins

In November the country of Japan will see Mullins in the classroom and on the lacrosse fields at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, courtesy of Japan Cable Vision, Ltd.

In the series called My Dream, Mullins will be seen walking to and from classes, socializing and playing lacrosse. In the clip, he states, "My dream is to help the UMass lacrosse team to the national championship and be the best lacrosse player I can be."

One day of filming and three days of editing is all the five-minute segment will require, and all this on a budget of around $2700. Prior Dream segments have included individuals from England, Australia, Canada and France. UMass was sifted out by researchers based in Atlanta, Georgia.

"About a week before school started, I had a note in my box that this Japanese television station called," said head lac?coach Ted Garber. "I was curious, and my AT&T card let me through, so I returned the call."

My Dream is a television spot that began as a filler. The primetime show starts at 8:15 p.m. It features everyday people at work and at play.

The camera angles focus on the eyes of the individuals featured because, according to the owner of JVC, Victor Higgins, "the eyes are very important to Japanese society."

"The eyes display emotion," Higgins said. "When you do what you like, your expression changes."

According to Higgins, there is a real problem with karoshi in Japan. The character karo translates to overstress and shi means death. He said the people of Japan are literally working themselves to death.

"What we want to relay to the Japanese people is that it is okay to do your dream," Higgins said. "You don't have to work 14, 15 hours a day to be an upright citizen. You have to make time for play in your life."

My Dream is edited to American music from the 1950's because, Higgins said, "in Japanese eyes, the 50's was the dream era."

So set the stage for researcher Helen Charles to approach the UMass men's lacrosse coach for a player he thought would best represent the school and the program.

Mullins was at UMass during the latter part of the summer and was often hanging around the lacrosse office. Garber said he asked Mullins if he would be willing to work with a Japanese TV crew on their project, and he consented.

"I was surprised they were doing something on UMass," Mullins said. Not only was Mullins a convenient subject — he was available and flexible — but he was also an appropiate candidate to represent the university's lax squad.

Mullins was chosen as a Boston Globe All-Scholastic in the 1986-87 season, and awarded the Athletic Award Medallion by the Concord-Carlisle Booster CLub, his high school alma matter.

After high school, he attended Bridgton Academy where he was named to the All-New England Prep School team before entering UMass in the fall of 1988.

After his first year of collegiate play, Mullins was named All-American and second team New England. He went on to be named All-American honorable mention and first team All-American this summer at the end of the UMass lax season.

DIVISION I MEN'S LACROSSE CHAMPIONSHIP

He will begin the 1991 spring season as a defensive captain for Garber's Gorillas, a team which finished the year ranked seventh in the country and hosted a first-round play-off berth in the NCAA Division I Men's Lacrosse Championship.

"Mr. Higgins told me they would use my voice, but put Japanese subtitles at the bottom of the screen," Mullins said smirking. "Kinda neat, huh?"

Sox slide to 4-1 loss, trail A's in series 3-0

Red Sox squander third lead in three games

BOSTON (AP) — If this all seems familiar, it is. The Oakland A's are winning with ease, and are on the verge of another sweep.

For the third straight game, Boston took its obligatory early lead Tuesday. And for the third straight game, the Athletics came back to win, not with home runs, but by combining singles with Red Sox mistakes for a 4-1 victory.

Willie Randolph, filling in for injured Walt Weiss, hit a pair of RBI singles and Dave Henderson, the new Mr. October, made the most of his first start with a sacrifice fly as the Athletics took a 3-0 lead in the American League playoffs.

All previous 17 teams that took a 3-0 edge in a postseason went on to win, 13 by sweeps.

And the Athletics will get their chance Wednesday when they send Dave Stewart against Roger Clemens in a rematch of Game 1 starters.

The Athletics, who swept Boston in the 1988 playoffs and won last year's World Series over San Francisco in four straight games, have now won nine in a row in the postseason. The Red Sox have lost nine straight, and their seventh consecutive playoff defeat sets a new record.

Mike Moore, who struggled all season, shut down Boston on one run and four hits for six innings. Oakland's bullpen then extended its scoreless streak to 6 2-3 innings in the series, with Dennis Eckersley pitching the ninth for his second save.

Mike Boddicker pitched well in defeat as the Red Sox again wasted another strong effort by a starter. Boddicker gave up just six singles, but three errors, three walks, and two hit batters hurt him.

In this game, the Red Sox bullpen didn't get a chance to blow it.

The Red Sox were 56-21 when scoring first in games during the regular season, but are 0-3 in the last week. Tom Brunansky's sacrifice fly put Boston ahead in the second, but the Red Sox could not extend it; instead, they extended their hitless streak with runners on base to 17 at-bats in the series.

Henderson's sacrifice fly and Randolph's single in the fourth put Oakland ahead and the Athletics added two more in the sixth on an error by shortstop Louis Rivera and another by catcher Tony Pena, who had the ball jarred loose from his mitt by Terry Steinbach.

The Athletics still have not hit a home run. Boston's Wade Boggs has the only one of the series. Of Oakland's 32 hits in the series, 29 are singles, and they have been enough.

The baseball comes out of the glove of Red Sox catcher Tony Pena as Oakland A's Terry Steinbach plows into him during a double steal in the sixth inning. The Sox lost 4-1, and trail the A's in the series 3-0.

Following lost weekend, volleyball beats Crusaders

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

Coming off a very disheartening loss to Duquesne University last Sunday, coach Carol Ford was concerned about the UMass women's volleyball team's ability to recover and perform well enough to beat A-10 rivals Rutgers and Temple this past weekend.

"We did not have the best week in practice," said Ford. "Our confidence was not up to where it was supposed to be."

The lack of confidence was evident against the strong Rutgers team, as the Minutewomen fell three games to one, 6-15, 2-15, 15-12 and 5-15.

Team chemistry was a major problem for UMass in this match, as it has been throughout the season.

Setter Angie Paolucci, who has played sparingly this season due to illness, started the first game, but was replaced by Cathy Smith in the second game.

By the time the Minutewomen got into sync, Rutgers had already determined the outcome of this match.

"Rutgers is a good team," said Ford. "You have to play to the best of your abiltiy against them."

After Friday night's loss, the Minutewomen supported the words of their coach who said they were "great kids" that hated losing and "came back" after dissapointing defeats.

UMass jumped out to an early lead against temple by winning the first two games (15-10, 15-13) before going down fighting in the last three games (11-15, 6-15, 9-15).

Although the team was still struggling with confidence, Ford labeled the match as being "real positive."

"This was a must win for us", said Ford. And while it "was good to get a W, we should've blown them out."

Ford said she was dissapointed that the team had to struggle so much to win, but was happy that Paolucci finally made it through an entire match.

Holy Cross marked the end of UMass' two week, six-match homestand.

The win improves the Minutewomen's record to 3-15 overall (0-4 in the Atlantic 10). UMass travels to conference rival Rhode Island on Friday.

Even though Ford was not happy with the overall quality of the match, UMass' victory over Holy Cross was a big win for the team.

After losing the first game 10-15, the Minutewomen won the second game 15-9 and never looked back, winning the next two games and the match 15-10 and 15-8.

Of course, winning cures all ills, and if the Minutewomen needed a confidence booster, then a win against Holy Cross on Tuesday would be the remedy for thier recent woes.

"We're really hoping for a big game against Holy Cross," Ford said before last night's match.

Team effort gained key yards

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The Lady of Liberty was not as effective against the University of Massachusetts football team as the Rhode Island Rams would have wished.

"We practiced the Statue of Liberty play all week and it just did not work," said Ram coach Bob Griffin.

Ram quarterback Kevin Neville, a YanCon Honor Roll recipient last week, led the conference in passing going into Saturday's game, but that may soon change. He was 8 for 23 in passes completed gaining 153 yards, including one touchdown. He was hampered, however by linebacker Mario Perry who sacked him twice.

"There are things we need to correct," Neville said in reference to the Rams' play Saturday. "All in all, we played a good game."

Receiving, URI tailback John Newson gained the most yards passing (62) and netted 40 yards in rushing. Ram tight end Darren Rizzi was not far behind with 59 yards gained in pass receptions. URI fullback Tony Lowe netted 86 yards for the team, the highest on Saturday.

In 25 attempts, UMass quarterback Gary Wikos completed 11 passes, gaining 129 yards in passing. He also was hindered by the Ram defensive line twice. Tackles John Klumbach and Rich Heffernan each sacked Wilkos.

"They knew Gary [Wilkos] would be dangerous," said tailback John Johnson. "We kept our composure and won it."

Johnson ate the most grass for UMass, netting 101 yards, followed by Wilkos (57).

"Only two of [the rollouts] were planned," said UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos. "The rest we improvised."

Improvisation seemed to be the saving grace for the Minutemen as time was running out — as was their patience. During the point-after attempt when UMass had rallied to tie URI at 13-all, head coach Jim Reid switched centers.

This caused some confusion not only for the press but for the players as well. Fifth-year senior Al Pogarian replaced junior Karl Russell.

"Russo was out and Alpo snapped," Reid said. He said he did not know why he put Pogarian in for that particular play. "[Pogarian] charged us up at halftime. He wants to do well."

The poor snap was bobbled by holder Ron Blauvelt. He ran with the ball and was tackled.

Kicker Marco Gabrielli looked at the ball and saw it was not on the tee. He swept out and was late on blocking.

Gabrielli was one-for-one in field goal attempts at 28 yards out. His average punt was 38 yards, gaining 268 yards in seven attempts. He had four punts within the 30 to 39 yard mark, the longest being 52 yards.

"I'm trying to be more consistant," said Gabrielli in reference to his punting yardage.

"And be prepared to run out," he added jokingly.

The Minutemen are now tied for first in the Yankee Conference with New Hampshire, both teams having one tie and no losses. All games for both teams have been in conference play. UMass now leads the YanCon with total offensive yards gained.

Academic depts. face major cuts

Compiled from Collegian staff reports

The School of Education and three foreign language programs are expected to suffer major reductions or possible eliminations as a result of a series of 4 percent across-the-board cuts that have struck the University of Massachusetts budget in the past three months.

The 10 or more departments slated for cuts are expected to be handed down this afternoon at the Faculty Senate meeting. A group of five administrators — referred to as the "Gang of Five" — has been analyzing programs for the past few weeks in search for areas of potential cuts.

The three language programs said to be slashed are the Slavic Languages and Literature, Germanic Language and Literature and Italian programs, according to a faculty member. The contracts of the associate professors will not be renewed, he said, in a plan formulated to gradually pare down the programs.

An unidentified faculty member yesterday confirmed reports of these major reductions in the language departments.

"I don't know what other programs are being cut, but I know the three in Herter Hall," he said. The faculty member then identified the three language departments slated for cuts.

Provost Richard O'Brien refused comment about the reductions and eliminations.

In response to threatened reductions and eliminations within the School of Education, graduate education students plan to lead a protest rally in front of the School of Business Administration building at 3:30 today, where the Faculty Senate will be meeting.

The reductions and eliminations come in the wake of a loss of over $16 million in the University's 1990-91 budget since the fiscal year began in July. According to figures released by the University Press Office, about 11 percent of the University's budget has already been cut.

The Faculty Senate voted two weeks ago to authorize administrators to go forth with a plan of reductions and eliminations. The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees last week approved a similar measure called retrenchment, a reduction in the work force because of financial reasons.

A faculty member said deans were notified this week of impending cuts through a series of meetings with the administration on Tuesday at the Whitmore Administration Building.

The heads of marked departments could not be reached for comment.

Collegian staff reporters Meredith O'Brien, Chris Muther and Preston P. Forman contributed to this report.

Horrors of illegal abortion stir AC

By AMY HENRY
Collegian Staff

Over 400 students gave three standing ovations last night at Amherst College to speakers Eleanor Smeal, president of the Fund for the Feminist Majority, and Bill Bell, the father of Becky Bell who died from an illegal abortion in 1988.

According to her father, Becky Bell had two options in obtaining an abortion. She could have gone 110 miles to Ilinois where abortions are legal, but she did not have the money or means of getting there. Or she could have stood before an anti-choice judge to ask for an abortion.

"She chose an illegal abortion because she did not want to disappoint us by telling us, and there were no other options. We would have helped her obtain an abortion," Bell said.

Ten days after her illegal abortion, Becky Bell died from pneumonia caused by an unsterile object that was placed in her uterus.

Bill and Karen Bell have joined the Feminist Majority on a nationwide campaign called the Becky Bell-Rosie Jimenez campaign. The second name is of a woman who was the first recorded death from an illegal abortion in 1977. The goals of the campaign are to increase the awareness of the seriousness of the parental consent law, which is enforced in 14 states, and to hold a registration to get students to vote for politicians supporting abortion rights.

"We are asking all pro-choice student groups on campuses to get involved," Smeal said.

Smeal said that ever since Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision to legalize abortion, abortion rights have been chipped away. A few months after Wade was passed, the Helms Amendment, which restricts the use of U.S. family planning funds for abortions, was passed.

"With the induction of Souter into the Supreme Court, who was against women and civil rights as a judge in New Hampshire and the 'right to have privacy,' and the already reactionary Court, we stand to lose even more abortion rights," Smeal said.

Bell said, "A couple of years ago I would have said the parental consent law was a good way to get young girls to tell their parents about wanting to have an abortion."

"I stand before you as living proof that parental consent doesn't work," he said.

Duffey defends Silber's tuition hike proposal

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

Democratic gubernatorial candidate John Silber's proposal to raise University of Massachusetts tuition by $5,000 is not as bad as it may seem, said President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey yesterday.

"This is not another 'Silber shocker,'" he said. "We have to set [Silber's] proposal in context. . .It will provide equity and justice."

Silber, on-leave Boston University president, released a tuition increase proposal in July that would allow students to pay only a rate of tuition their families could afford.

"Many of those students who attend the University of Massachusetts, like those attending Boston University, come from families with substantial incomes, and some of them come from wealthy families," Silber said in a letter sent to state college and university presidents.

"They will not need any financial aid at all," Silber continued. "And the increased tuition they pay can be used either for academic enrichment or to provide financial aid to students who come from poorer families."

Those students whose families cannot afford tuition increases would be compensated with additional financial aid, Silber said.

Duffey conceded that some students can easily absorb a tuition hike, while acknowledging there are many at UMass who are "living close to the margin" and could be hurt by increases.

In addition to the tuition proposal, Silber suggests that all public colleges and universities gain more autonomy from the Board of Regents and funnel their own tuition payments and fees back into individual campuses. The Board of Regents oversees state colleges and universities.

With tuition increases being allotted at the level of family income, students who pay their own college expenses, receiving no money from parents or family, would be forced to pay more tuition than they could afford.

But Duffey said parents have an obligation to pay for their children's education and should not pass the tuition onus down to the students. "I will do everything in my power to make them [parents] take their responsibilities," he said. "Young people should go to court to make a claim on their parents [to make them pay for their education]."

Dukakis: No more cuts to local aid

BOSTON (AP)— Gov. Michael S. Dukakis says he doesn't plan to propose any more cuts in state aid to municipalities, but he can't make any promises if the Citizens for Limited Taxation tax and fee rollback is approved.

Dukakis told municipal officials Tuesday at a meeting of the Local Government Advisory Committee that local aid would remain untouched as he works to chop an additional $464 million to bring the 1991 fiscal year budget into balance.

"We are going to do our best to protect you from further cuts," Dukakis said.

The governor acknowledged that further cuts in the more than $2 billion of the state's aid to cities and towns were part of a package he presented last month to bond rating agencies.

But the rating agencies rejected the idea because it would have to require legislative approval and told Dukakis instead to trim the $13.4 billion budget in areas under his direct control.

A Supreme Judicial Court decision earlier this year said Dukakis does not have unilateral power to cut local aid once he has signed a budget bill into law.

Dukakis reiterated that he planned to ask the Legislature to approve cuts in its own budget and that of the court system and constitutional officers, such as the attorney general and secretary of state, but not aid to cities and towns.

"Our first response is to be appreciative of not being part of the further cuts," said Paul Marshall, the Lexington selectman who serves as president of the Massachusetts Municipal Association.

Mayors and other local officials joined Dukakis at the meeting in urging voters to reject the CLT petition, question three on the Nov. 6 general election ballot.

The petition would roll back taxes and fees to 1988 levels and cut state revenues by as much as $3 billion over 18 months starting Jan. 1.

Marshall said city and town officials are convinced that if the petition passes, the state will be forced to cut local aid to help balance its own books.

Newman Center approaches fundraising goal

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY
Collegian Staff

The Newman Center is getting closer to raising its set goal of $165,000 in the annually held Phone-a-Thon, which will last until Oct. 18.

The telethon started on Sept. 30, and so far it has raised slightly over $100,000, according to the organizers. The revenue which will be raised is expected to cover one-third of operational costs for the Newman Center in the 1990-1991 fiscal year.

The Newman Center opened in 1963 under the sponsorship of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Springfield. The Center receives no funds from the University or the state, said Phone-a-Thon Director Judith Smith. It operates on the revenues generated by the Newman Center Cafeteria, Bay Bank Automatic Teller Machines and Phone-a-Thon.

Raising money for Newman is "a Herculean task," said Father J. Joseph Quigley, director of the Center. The bulk of the task includes organization of the event, which in itself costs $40,000, as well as development of the sources from which donations could be solicited, he said.

The primary sources include Catholic alumni at the University of Massachusetts and parents of present Catholic students. According to Quigley, there are between 5,000 and 10,000 Catholic students on campus in addition to more than 20,000 alumni.

The donations are solicited through telephones which are operated by approximately 30 volunteers who come in every weeknight, from Sunday to Thursday. Most of the volunteers are students, with approximately three quarters of students coming from the Greek area, according to Smith.

Smith attributed the high rate of volunteer effort coming from the Greek area to the fact that Newman is close to the fraternity housing area. Many residents use Newman on a nightly basis, either for studying or socializing.

Smith said that the level of volunteer commitment represents "a phenomenal response" to Newman's needs. "They are interested in 'keeping the place alive,'" she said.

Newman's popularity, particularly that of the cafeteria, has been on the rise for years. According to Quigley, approximately 3,000 students use the cafeteria daily, as opposed to 300 who used it in the early 1960s.

Tower Library evacuated

Compiled by PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

The Tower Library was evacuated yesterday at about noon when an exhaust fan on the 22nd floor of the library overheated. There was "minimal damage," according to a campus fire official.

David J. Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer in the Environmental Health and Safety, said an exhaust fan on elevator one began to overheat and smoke at about 12:06 p.m.

The exhaust fan provides fresh air to the elevator car, Beaudin said.

Beaudin said while there was minimal damage to the unit, Amherst Fire Department responded with a "full complement" of fire engines because of the size of the building.

The elevator was reopened soon after the incident.

LARCENY

- A stop sign was reported stolen from a traffic booth on the perimeter of the campus sometime before Tuesday. Police said a padlock used to secure the door was also stolen. The estimated value is $60.
- Five yellow speed bumps affixed to the surface of North Village Road were stolen sometime before Tuesday. The estimated value is $440.

P-Flag gives advice to friends and families of GLB community

By SEAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Correspondent

Since 1986, Parents Families/Friends Lesbians And Gays (P-FLAG) Pioneer Valley has offered support to the loved ones and heterosexual allies of gays, lesbians, bisexuals and other sexual minorities.

According to Jean and Jim Genasci, educators by profession and co-founders of the local P-FLAG chapter, "The norm is that people are pretty shook up [when someone close first comes out]." However, "people have to do their homework if they're going to surmount this social stigma," said Mr. Genasci.

While the acceptance process may take from one month to over 10 years, P-FLAG stresses that the sooner individuals network, the faster they will progress. The organization sponsors regular meetings for people to discuss their shared experiences and read from an expansive collection of brochures, clippings and fact sheets.

If someone finds a group setting intimidating, private consultations at other locations or over the telephone are available.

The Genascis regularly make referrals to other organizations and support groups, including the 234 other P-FLAG chapters throughout the United States. They have also attended conferences, offered support to AIDS victims, set up information tables and participated in numerous events, including GLB Awareness Days at the University of Massachusetts.

Ms. Genasci said that one out of every four people has an immediate family member who is gay. Because this statistic is surprising to many, P-FLAG considers it a reminder of how "invisible and oppressed" sexual minorities remain. Through direct contact, it strives to create an environment of caring and understanding toward the GLB community.

P-FLAG invites concerned individuals to attend its meetings the second Tuesday of every month at 7:30 p.m. in the Grace Episcopal Church Parish Hall in Amherst. Jean and Jim Genasci can be reached at 532-4883.

Rosenberg backs educ., blasts CLT

Editor's note: The Collegian will be profiling candidates contending for public office locally and statewide to preview the Nov. 6 election.

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Rep. Stanley Rosenberg, the incumbent democratic candidate for the state representative seat in the Amherst area, is running for his third term on a platform opposing the tax rollback petition and defending public education.

The Citizens for Limited Taxation petition, ballot question number three, would reduce tax revenues for legislative discretionary spending for a three-year fiscal loss of $6.369 billion. Proponents of the petition believe a rollback is the only way to reduce legislative spending, which they see as the cause of the state deficit.

Rosenberg has condemned the petition as "the undoing of Massachusetts" and the University, which has estimated the rollback would reduce the campus budget by $28 million this year, causing a $2,000 tuition hike and employee layoffs.

"The real agenda of CLT is to privatize what the state government does and to turn UMass into a private university," he said.

Rosenberg said the working class have a legitimate complaint against the state since they have been bearing a disproportionate share of the tax burden, but he said people supporting CLT do not understand that every state service has a price.

"Taxes on the average person are increasing while decreasing for the rich," he said. He added that he would continue to work for tax reform.

He also believes that human services programs could be systematically changed to reduce bureaucracy for fairer pricing of services, in agreement with a reform proposal made by state administrators.

Rosenberg has recently been appointed to the House Ways and Means Committee and also belongs to the Reorganization Commission for Higher Education.

The Reorganization Commission will examine the structure and financing of higher education to devise a specific plan in December 1991, he said.

Rosenberg has proposed to the Commission that public colleges and universities retain the full amount of tuition revenues instead of jointly sending $125 million yearly to a general state fund.

"When the fiscal situation of the Commonwealth improves, each campus can put the money instead into endowment funds or set aside a part of it for rough fiscal times," he said.

He also said the Board of Regents of Higher Education's responsibilities should be reduced to a coordinating board, giving campus administrators more control over certain decisions.

"There needs to be system-wide accountability, but that should not hinder the ability for campuses to make day-to-day decisions without interference," he said.

Rosenberg said he will continue "an aggressive agenda" for environmental protection. He will also work on implementing changes to make foster care systems "more effective and sensitive."

U.S. funding of Angola wrong

For the past five years, the United States has been financing UNITA, the guerrilla army seeking to overthrow the government of Angola.

An estimated 50 to 100 million taxpayer dollars go each year to fund death and destruction in this Southern African nation.

Toni B. Hochstadt

This is a "covert" war, funded through the CIA, with all matters handled in secret sessions of the congressional intelligence committees.

Now, for the first time since 1986, Congress has agreed to open floor debate on UNITA funding.

This is a precious opportunity to halt the lethal covert funding of this war.

There is no logic to U.S. support for UNITA other than a knee-jerk Cold War reaction. For many years the U.S. government feared that Angola was a "Soviet" tool.

However, in many ways Angola is more closely tied to Western nations than to the Soviet Union. Numerous U.S. corporations conduct business within Angola.

The Bush administration and many members of Congress champion Jonas Savimbi, leader of UNITA, as a freedom fighter for his democratic ideals, but his leadership practices do not reflect a commitment to democratic procedures.

Savimbi's goal is personal power, not democracy.

The war in Angola is escalating at a tremendous human cost. UNITA's tactic of placing land mines in fields and other civilian areas has not only halted food production in many regions, but given Angola the world's highest amputee rate.

UNITA routinely targets rural water systems and health care facilities, depriving many of water and leading to the world's highest infant mortality rate.

According to the U.N., Angola has 50,000 war orphans, 782,000 people facing starvation and over $20 billion in property damage.

The Angolan government has recently reaffirmed its commitment to a multi-party system and has invited UNITA to help draft a new constitution.

Cuban troops are gradually withdrawing in accordance with a U.S. plan. The U.S.S.R. has agreed to cut all aid to UNITA. At a time when a ceasefire is in sight, the U.S. has escalated arms shipments to UNITA. Sambivi recently visited the U.S. to lobby for additional aid.

It is urgent that the public call for debate on Angola and put an end to U.S. military subsidies.

Call, write and send telegrams to your senators and representatives. Urge them to demand open debate when the issue gets to the floor and to vote against all aid to UNITA.

By ending covert aid to UNITA and redoubling diplomatic efforts, the U.S. can support the efforts of the people of Angola to create an indigenous and sustainable democracy built on the desire for freedom and participation, not the fear of violent conflict.

School spirit could be a fresh change

The leaves have finally changed, and the beautiful Amherst foliage is at its peak. Some of the most incredible scenery surrounds us. In the fine tradition of fall, we embark on yet another seasonal ritual-sport. The American League play-offs (or should I say beating), football and, of course, homecoming.

Homecoming? Is this weekend homecoming? Oct. 13 and 14 is homecoming weekend at UMass. But what do we do for homecoming? What sets this weekend apart from any others?

Erin Martin

In the tradition of all fine universities, it is an excuse to tap a keg at 11 a.m. It is a chance for students on this campus to identify with one another, to come together in support of one crusade. . . a Minutemen football victory.

I started attending this University after tailgating and drinking at football games had already been abolished. Since that time, attendance at sporting events has diminished. Is it a lack of school spirit or a ban on alcohol that keeps the masses away?

At other colleges, where the alumni pour money into the athletic programs, sporting events draw record crowds. Homecoming is usually a celebration of touchdowns and terrific times.

Last night, I talked on the phone with my best friend who is a senior at Boston College. We discussed our plans for the weekend.

"Oh, I might go to our football game on Saturday, it's homecoming this weekend."

"Really? Who are you playing?" she asked.

With embarrassment I sighed and said, "I don't know."

"You mean to tell me that you don't even know who your school is up against on Saturday?"

"Well, no. . ."

"Then what DO you do for homecoming? Do you have a dance or a ball or something?"

I fought back my laughter. "A ball? At UMass? What, are you kidding? No, we don't have a ball. Why do you?" I asked.

"Of course! Homecoming is a big deal! There is a formal dance, tailgate parties, a big football game. It's a huge weekend here at BC. People are already making their plans!"

"Well, there are quite a few things about UMass and BC that are different, you know." And I went on to explain.

UMass does not receive much in the way of alumni contributions, especially in comparison with a small, private college. Alumni don't buy season tickets to our football games.

And we don't have a huge sporting arena or hockey rink.

We don't have tailgate parties because drinking is forbidden at sporting events on our campus. Shameful but true, this probably explains our lack of school spirit and embarrassing attendance figures at our football games.

So, is homecoming an event recognized by the University? Does our football team plan for a big game with hundreds of fans? Do the alumni, recent graduates or those from years past realize this is the weekend to return to their alma mater?

I realize that, being at such a large university, we cannot possibly bring back all our graduates. But we can get together with students from the past. You might even consider attending the football game on Saturday — a little school spirit could be a fresh change from the everyday complaints about this place.

And, if after the game you want to party, get uptown early.

Last year, lines began forming at 4 o'clock.

America should take care of itself

On Aug. 2, 1990, Kuwait was invaded by Iraq. The crisis that evolved from this invasion still goes on today. Should we as Americans be involved in this prolonged and costly situation?

President Bush stated to Congress, "They remind us who is keeping America strong. They do."— referring to the American servicewomen and men who are in the Middle East to protect American interests. But what are our interests there?

Daniel Gittelsohn

Bush is leading us to believe our main interest is to protect the American citizens who are living in Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. I believe that our main interest is the oil.

If our main interest were to protect American citizens, then he would have enforced more stringent sanctions on Iraq if all American citizens were not free to leave. Instead our army, which will take billions of dollars to support, is still there protecting what I believe is the oil situation.

Being in the Middle East and spending exorbitant amounts of funds is only making America economically weaker.

America is kept strong more by the people than the government. The majority of the American people are more honest, and they have a better realization of what should and should not be done in government than the politicians themselves. The majority of politicians, including the President, tend not to be honest, and often make poor decisions which govern our lives.

Our country is weakened because those in a position of power often misuse it, and this filters down and makes America weak. A strong country is one in which the people and the politicians work together to make reasonable decisions.

We can become a stronger country if we can fill political positions with people who are willing to work with citizens who elected them and listen to their complaints and ideas.

Spending $17.7 billion, whether half of it is donated or not, is absurd. With so many domestic problems in our own country, such as welfare, homelessness, starvation and the budget, we should not be spending money we do not have.

Although we get a great deal of fuel from the Mideast, we have enough to get by without their aid. It seems that the U.S. is always helping other countries. It's about time that American asked those nations standing behind it to put in their share and take control of the situation.

Spending of this type only weakens the U.S. finances a great deal. The U.S. is in too much trouble supporting its own domestic problems to involve itself in the affairs of other nations.

If the U.S. does not start thinking about itself and its citizens, it will eventually become a disgrace and crumble. It is going to take a new and improved governmental body to clean up the problems facing this country.

Once domestic problems are solved, then we can go about giving aid to other countries. We must, without question, teach this generation to work together

AIDS Quilt remembers family, friends who have suffered

Editor's note: This column is being reprinted due to previous graphic problems.

"...Jack Caster...Wes C onk...Roger Lyon..." Read over a loud speaker, the names of the deceased echo throughout the oversized gym and continue in a quilt connected with seams which stretch for 78 miles and memories which are infinite.

"...Michael Bennett...Charles Ludlum...Roy Cohn..." The quilt weighs 13 tons and is so heavy it overwhelms one's heart.

A person in front of me bows his head, shadowing tears from the rest of us who have come to see the AIDS Memorial Quilt. Sitting on the floor, streams flow down his cheeks as he tenderly touches the quilt. The sponsor is The Names Project, yet for him it is not just a name, but perhaps a friend, or a parent, or a sibling, or "...Dan Eicholtz...Stephen Stucker...Jerry Smith..."

"Michel Foucault...Jon Sims...Ed Mock..." As of May 1990, they totalled 80,791 dead with 132,510 others positively diagnosed. They too will surely die, as there is no cure.

AIDS, sadly enough, is a disease that has been placed on the scale on which society weighs people's worth. And the worth of homosexuals is considered less than the worth of others.

It is a stigmatized illness which affects sections of society who are seen as less desirable, and thus people just don't care.

While thousands had already died, it was not seriously addressed by our government until 1986, six years after the discovery of the disease, when Ronald Reagan asked the Surgeon General to write a report on the AIDS epidemic. "By the time President Reagan delivered his first speech about AIDS, 36,058 people had been diagnosed with the disease; 20,849 had died (And The Band Played On, Randy Shiltz)."

Adam Stein

There is an inconsistent response to disasters which affect the White heterosexual communities as opposed to those catastrophes felt outside of the mainstream. The most popular example was the massive manhunt launched by Mayor Flynn of Boston against the supposed African-American murderer of Charles Stuart's wife, when murders occurring in the same area against non-Whites are investigated with much less vigor.

Another example of society's valuing some lives more than others was the attention given to the Tylenol scare. When cyanide was discovered in capsules, the New York Times wrote a story on the scare everyday for that October (1982) and produced 23 pieces in the two months after that (Shiltz).

However, by Oct. 5, 260 people had died of AIDS, with another 374 infected, yet the New York Times had written only three stories about the epidemic in 1981 and three more stories in all of 1982 (Shiltz).

Society's weighing of deaths within the mainstream as more important than the deaths of gays was not only evident in the unequal media coverage of AIDS, but also in government funding of the disease. In 1976 a disease broke out among a group of married White American Legion conventioners in Philadelphia. The epidemic, which claimed far fewer lives than AIDS, became known as Legionnaire's Disease and was being researched by the National Institute of Health (NIH) at the same time as AIDS. NIH Legionairre's spending in 1982 was $34,841 per death as opposed to the $3,225 spent per AIDS d..ath (Shiltz). The main difference between the victims was their sexual orientation.

"...Court Miller...Max Robinson..." Names have no sexual orientation, for they are just people, free from society's devaluing. Mothers/fathers ...sons/daughters ...brothers/ sisters ...friends ...lovers ...They should be free from society's devaluing.

It is this which the AIDS Memorial Quilt tries to convey and, as the demographics of AIDS victims continue to change and more heterosexuals are woven into the panels of the quilt, it will be this we must remember. (Currently, 26 percent of those with AIDS received the virus through heterosexual sex or IV drug use.)

Censoring viewpoints an outlet of freedom of expression

Years ago, there was an upright citizen who owned a Chicago barber shop. One morning during election season he discovered that his barberpole and front window had been smashed during the night.

Karl Rookey

It seems that he had mentioned the relative merits of the "wrong" political candidate to one of his customers the previous day, and the damaged store front was a gentle reminder that no one could possibly vote knowingly for the "wrong" man.

The barber had no right to complain, as the political candidate he was touting had faulty political beliefs. Because the barber was advertising his candidate, some of the shop's customers might have voted for the barber's candidate, and if enough people voted for the scoundrel, the good guys would lose. The barber's campaigning had to be silenced somehow.

It is rumored that had one of the barber shop's assailants been asked if the barber had freedom of speech, the thug would have replied self-righteously, "Not while I'm around."

I have a similar, but less dramatic story about UMass.

Everyone knows that question three on November's ballot is the epitome of evil. If it should pass, destruction would surely fall immediately upon the Massachusetts public higher education system. Therefore, no one on campus would support the question — except for a friend of mine, who believes the failure of question three would mean more certain and permanent destruction to UMass.

My friend put up signs saying, "Vote yes on question three" and "Do you want the University to go up in smoke?", placing them next to posters of the opposing view: "Equal time for the views of the opposition," my friend said.

If you followed my story about the barber, you'll know what happened. My friend's signs came down. He informed me within an hour every sign he put up had been ripped down. Of course, if he had half a brain, my friend would have known those signs just had to come down: If people were convinced to vote "yes," then there wouldn't be enough people to vote "no" and the good guys would lose. My friend had no right to complain.

In fact, because the Constitution guarantees that no legislative body shall impede the freedom of speech, it is the responsibility of the individual to censor alternative viewpoints.

Without those dedicated individuals who destroy barbershop windows and tear down signs with which they don't agree, how would we ever know exactly which view point we are supposed to hold? It would never do for us to know that both sides of an issue have supporters — we might not know enough to vote for the right choice. Knowledge, after all, breeds confusion.

My friend said that after posting one of his signs, he heard a ripping as he turned the corner. Intrigued, he turned around in time to hear a woman say, "He has a right to free speech, too." And the man to whom she spoke said, "Not while I'm around."

Release American hostages first

One can easily say the impending hostilities with Iraq are largely due to the U.S. not having a workable energy policy and our continued stubborn clinging to 18 mpg vehicles.

Often this is the only argument considered when looking at the Iraq situation. There are other factors we should consider, however minimalized they have been by the media and our government.

The U.S. government has as a part of its duty to its citizens their protection from hostile foreign powers. Clearly, this includes protection from unwarranted detention by hostile governments. The U.S. government, therefore, has as its duty the freeing of American hostages from Saddam Hussein, at any cost.

Hussein has tried to bargain with the U.S. government, using the lives and freedom of American hostages as his major tradeable commodity. The freedom of these hostages is not and cannot ever be considered a negotiable point — for if the freedom of even one man becomes a negotiable issue, the freedom of all men becomes a negotiable issue.

There is nothing of greater value than the freedom of the individual. The U.S. Constitution was written with this concept as one of its primary tenets. The U.S. government must be guided by and uphold this ideal for the benefit of its citizens. Once it abandons this ideal, it ceases to justifiably exist.

Only after every American hostage is released and delivered safely into the hands of our government should any negotiation for the continued existence of Hussein's government be considered.

Currently, he can be considered no more than a criminal, and as such he has no right to demand anything.

Picture gives one aspect of hero

In this age when so much recent U.S. history is rewritten (or merely unknown), I would like to comment upon the picture which the Collegian ran of Malcolm X with an automatic weapon (Sept. 18, Page 1).

While this is certainly a riveting photo, it contributes to the myth of Malcolm X as a fire-breathing fanatic with a narrow world view. Yet, as anyone who has read the eye-opening classic, "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" can attest to, the author's worldview was far from static or rigid.

After a childhood and young adulthood of considerable pain and marginalization (some of it self-imposed but much of it foisted on him by a racist culture), Malcolm X seized on a lengthy stint in a Massachusetts prison to educate himself.

He emerged as a brilliant leader committed to the cause of Black power and liberation and an enduring enemy of racism. His views continued to evolve until he was tragically assassinated.

He was especially moved by a journey to the Muslim holy city of Mecca where he witnessed Black and White Muslims worshipping together.

I'm not sure where the rifle-clad photo came from, but it should be seen as only one aspect of a complex and heroic figure.

Nursing Association thanks Rep., Trustee

This is an open letter to Rep. Stan Rosenberg and Student Trustee Angus McQuilken:

We would like to extend our thanks to you for taking the time to meet with us recently. We left highly informed as to how, if passed, ballot question number three will affect the University, the local community and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

On Nov. 6, we will go to the voting booths with the knowledge that if the CLT petition passes, our future as students at UMass-Amherst and health care providers will be threatened.

We realize that, as future nurses, we require a comprehensive education to meet the health care needs of the Commonwealth. The demands of increased drug and alcohol abuse, physical abuse, AIDS, cancer, teen pregnancy and the longevity of our elders require nurses who can provide care in diverse settings and populations.

We hope that voters will remember that as nurses we will be there for them and their families and that their vote will determine who will be cared for, how they will be cared for and the quality of their health care providers.

Students should oppose criminal killers in govt

I read Owen Broadhurst's piece with great interest ("Republic's politics ignores North's struggle," Oct. 3).

It was fascinating not just for its anti-British tirade but also for its attack on the democratically-elected government of the South.

From Mr. Broadhurst's description of the "freedom fighters" in the North, I presume he supports the provisional IRA.

The Provos claim they are the only legitimate government of all Ireland. This is obviously a very strong claim, based as it is on the fact that they lost the vote in Ireland's parliament in 1922 over splitting the island into two parts.

A more recent mandate could be based on their overwhelming support in Northern Ireland's last election — 11.3 percent.

It should be remembered that in 1969, when British troops were first deployed to keep sectarian crowds apart, they were met by Catholics with cups of tea as friends.

Dismayed by their lack of support, the IRA started shooting troops from Catholic areas, provoking fire and searches in return, which led to today's troubles.

But we should not forget the IRA's claim to legitimacy — their "justice."

True people were unfairly sent to prison in Britain for alleged bombings, but they are now being cleared at appeal. There is no appeal from IRA "courts" which have knee-capped over 1,000 people (shot through the back of the knee) or IRA murderers who have killed, among others, a Catholic priest, a nun, a six-month-old baby and dozens of the retired.

I don't ask everyone to agree with how Ireland is divided, but hope that UMass students will join the vast bulk of both British and Irish (on both sides of the border) in opposing the criminal killers who claim to be government.

Murder in Jerusalem

On Oct. 9, Israeli police conducted a systematic massacre of Palestinians in the sacred Al-Aksa mosque in Jerusalem, killing at least 22 and injuring over 100. Elsewhere, the Israel Defence Forces raised the day's toll by killing two and injuring 80.

The statistics of death are as dry as the blood on the sidewalks of Occupied Palestine. The reactions are entirely predictable. A sampling of these voices follows: We're talking about people who went up to the Temple Mount not to pray, but to take advantage of the holy places to supply themselves with stones . — Roni Milo, Israeli Police Minister

The police performed their job in the best possible way by preventing this mob from injuring Jews. . .What do you want us to do? Give them presents? — Ariel Sharon, Israeli Housing Minister

I am distressed by the lack of compassion and understanding of Israel's sense of being under siege in a violent Middle East — Abraham H. Fox, director of the Anti-Defamation League

We were inside the mosque shouting Islamic and nationalist slogans like 'Allah Akbar,' and the police asked us to stop, but we didn't. They began to shoot randomly and a lot of people were inside the mosque. Prayers hadn't begun yet, and the soldiers were shooting; they didn't differentiate between young and old people — An injured Gaza Palestininan, who refused to be named for fear of reprisal.

To those readers who are struggling to comprehend the magnitude of the Zionist rampage in Palestine and the consequent outrage of Third World nationals, I regret being forced to sacrifice historical continuity due to space constraints.

To those readers who endlessly attempt to muzzle critics of Israeli state-sponsored terrorism by calling them anti-Semitic, extremist, etc., I offer no apologies.

Israel could not have selected a more appropriate place to demonstrate its utter contempt for Arab life and Islamic values. The killing ground happens to be the third most holy site to Islamic people, after Mecca and Medina in so-called Saudi Arabia.

As the word of prophet Mohammed spread across Palestine in the seventh century, Muslim rulers built a gold-domed mosque called the mosque of Omar on a plateau called Haram Al-Sharif that overlooks the ancient walled city of Jerusalem. A second mosque was constructed next to the mosque of Omar, and is called Al-Aksa.

The mosque of Omar enshrines a rock that symbolizes faith. The prophet Mohammed is believed to have departed the earth from this rock and travelled to heaven on a white horse.

Pratip Dastidar

The Haram Al-Sharif is a proud symbol of Palestinian national identity. It should not come as a surprise to those familiar with the Zionist ideology that the Haram Al-Sharif should be targeted by the settler-colonists for desecration.

The Zionists turned to Jewish history to find justification for this new outrage, just as they used this history to evict the Palestinians from their land, bulldoze their villages, pen them in refugee camps and murder them from Beirut to Tunis.

And so they noted that King Solomon built a Jewish temple on the plateau three thousand years ago that was later destroyed by the Babylonians. The temple was rebuilt by King Herod, only to be destroyed by the Romans two thousand years ago.

These incidents from the last millenium apparently justify murder in 1990. The Jewish states of the last millenium also apparently justify the destruction of Palestine in 1948.

And yet, when Saddam Hussein rejects arbitrary British colonial borders that were finalized sixty-eight years ago, his claims are unanimously rejected by the same Israel (not to mention the Europe-U.S. alliance) as historically untenable!

But let us return to the issue at hand. The Israelis annexed Jerusalem in 1967. There was no outraged Western response, no sanctions, no deployment of armies. Zionist groups were given the green signal to reassert Jewish control over Haram Al-Sharif with the aim of rebuilding the temple.

These groups attempted to conduct Jewish prayers in the mosque. In 1982, a Zionist gunman sprayed bullets inside the mosque. By 1985, the Zionist zealots had transcended mere bullets and tried to blow it up with explosives.

Dubious archaeologists conducted questionable digs right next to the mosque. Provocation was the order of the day.

One such group, called the Temple Mount Faithful, makes an annual attempt to lay a cornerstone for the new Jewish temple in the Haram Al-Sharif. They do so during the Jewish Succoth festival, when prayers are offered at the Wailing Wall.

Add to these ominous portents the current explosive situation in Arab Jerusalem. Over the past year thousands of Soviet Jews have been encouraged to settle in the Palestinian sector of Jerusalem in a systematic plan to colonize the city.

In the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza, new settlements mushroomed. Israeli soldiers carried on their murderous repression, killing over 1,000 men, women and children. Over 20,000 teenagers and intellectuals remained incarcerated.

The word transfer hung heavy in the air. It refers to a plan to deport the entire population of occupied Palestine into Jordan and Lebanon (presumably under the cover of a U.S. attack on Iraq) mimicking the way in which Palestinians were terrorized into fleeing Israel in 1948.

It was against this backdrop that the Palestinians observed the Temple Mount Faithful staging a symbolic march near the mosque, early on Monday morning. Leaders appealed to their people to defend the mosque against any attempt to defile its sanctity.

The grounds of the Haram Al-Sharif were packed with Palestinians of all ages by late morning, and nationalist slogans were chanted to keep morale up.

But Israel's security forces rule with an iron fist. They obey a simple law. When Palestinians assemble in a crowd anywhere in the territories, load the Uzi and Galil rifles, call for reinforcements and kill.

The IDF's killing of Arabs is truly non-discriminatory. Gender, class and age are irrelevant. It is also perfectly secular. Muslims and Christians are slaughtered equally, mosques and churches can be violated with abandon.

So, in keeping with these hallowed traditions, the security forces stormed the sacred Haram Al-Sharif (it is a grim irony that the name translates as noble sanctuary). Guns roared and the unarmed Arabs were sprayed with bullets and tear gassed.

At this point, some Palestinians barricaded themselves and hurled stones at Jewish worshippers at the Wailing Wall. The area was promptly evacuated by Israeli police.

By now, the Haram Al-Sharif was drenched in blood. Chaos reigned in nearby Mokassed hospital, where doctors in stained smocks tended to patients lying in pools of blood.

Haram Al-Sharif has joined a tragic list of names where colonial forces killed the unarmed in cold blood — Jallianwala Bagh (where British slayed Indians), Deir Yassin (where Israelis slayed Palestinians), Wounded Knee (where the U.S. slayed Native Americans, Baku (where the Russians slayed Azerbaijanis). . .

Over the next few days we will be treated to the tragi-comic spectacle of the U.S. mildly rebuking its errant client in the U.N. but denying observer status for the U.N. in the territories.

There will be the equally nauseating sight of the oil-sheikhs of Kuwait and the Emirates piously affirming their commitment to the Palestinians after cutting off aid to the P.L.O. The Egyptian state will also join their ranks, even as it embraces Israel.

Here on this campus some will sponsor lectures that muse on how Israel can survive the challenge of Palestinian rights.

Others will mourn the deaths.

But Palestine will live.

Let Zionism speak for itself

Rather than write another article asserting, once again, that Zionism often looks to many of us from the Third World like a form of racism, colonialism and oppression, I felt that it would be more to the point to simply present a series of illustrative quotations from the leaders of the movement and the Israeli State.

Perhaps, after reading these quotations, the reader will be tempted to reflect on his/her own assumptions and take a fresh look at the question. Perhaps we are not being automatically paranoid, hysterical or anti-Semitic when we raise these concerns. At least, I hope to show why many of us entertain conceptions of Israel so at odds with the perceived wisdom in the U.S.A..

Hussein Ibish

"Neither Jewish ethics nor Jewish tradition can disqualify terrorism as a means of combat. We are very far from having any moral qualms as far as our national war goes. We have before us the command of the Torah, whose morality surpasses that of any other body of laws in the world: 'Ye shall blot them out to the last man.'" — Present Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, (1943)

". . .only in a very few places of our colonization were we not forced to transfer the earlier residents." — First Israeli Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion (1938)

". . .the only solution is the Land of Israel, or at least the Western Land of Israel [i.e. Palestine], without Arabs. There is no room for compromise on this point! . . .there is no way besides transferring the Arabs from here to the neighboring countries, transferring them all. Except perhaps for Bethlehem, Nazareth and Old Jerusalem, we must not leave a single village, not a single tribe." — JNF Director Yosef Weitz (1941).

"After the formation of a large army in the wake of the establishment of the state, we will abolish partition and expand to the whole of Palestine." — Ben-Gurion (1937)

"Let us not ignore the truth among ourselves. Politically, we are the aggressor and they defend themselves. . .The country is theirs, because they inhabit it, whereas we come here and want to settle down, and in their view we want to take away from them their country. . ." — Ben-Gurion (1938)

"Alon repeated his question: 'What is to be done with the population [of Lydda and Ramleh]? BG waved his hand in a gesture that said: Drive them out! Alon and I held a consultation. I agreed that it was essential to drive the inhabitants out.'" — Yitzhak Rabin (1948)

"The conclusions from Dayan's words are clear: This state has no international worries, no economic problems, the question of peace is nonexistent. . .It must calculate its steps narrow-mindedly and live on its sword. It must see the sword as the main, if not the only instrument with which to keep its morale high and to retain its moral tension. Towards this end it may, no, it must, invent dangers, and to do this it must adopt the method of provocation and revenge. . .Above all, let us hope for a new war with the Arab countries, so that we may finally get rid of our troubles and acquire our space." — Prime Minister Moshe Sharett (1955)

"According to him [Dayan], the only thing that's necessary is to find an officer, even just a Major. We should either win his heart or buy him with money, to make him agree to declare himself the savior of the Maronite population. Then the Israeli army will enter Lebanon, and will create a Christian regime. . .The territory from the Litani [river] southward will be annexed by Israel and everything will be all right." — Sharett (1954)

"One, that the army considers the present border with Jordan as absolutely unacceptable. Two, that the army is planning a war in order to occupy the rest of Western Eretz Israel." — Sharett (1953)

"In June 1967, we again had a choice. The Egyptian army concentrations in the Sinai approaches do not prove that Nasser was really about to attack us. We must be honest with ourselves, we decided to attack him." — Prime Minister Menachem Begin (1982)

"It was not as though there was a Palestinian people in Palestine considering itself as a Palestinian people and we came and threw them out and took their country away from them. They did not exist." — Prime Minister Golda Meir

"It is necessary to prevent the inhabitants of the [occupied] territories from participating in shaping the political future of the territory and they must not be seen as a partner for dealings with Israel; [hence] the absolute prohibition of any political organization. . ." — Former Israeli Chief of Intelligence Shlomo Gazit (1973)

"The past is immutable and the Bible is the decisive document in determining the fate of our land." — To-be Prime Minister Shimon Peres (1979)

"Israel will never talk to the P.L.O. and will not agree to a Palestinian state. . ." — Prime Minister Shamir (1990)

It will be said, no doubt, that I have taken these quotations out of context, and/or that I am motivated by anti-Semitic tendencies. Neither of these are true. What is, however, true is that the portrait of the Zionist state and movement suggested by these quotes is incomplete and designed to make a point, as any such selection is. A genuine understanding requires more reading and research. But what I call attention to is a portion of history that usually has been deliberately suppressed in the West.

It will also certainly be said that a similar piece could be done on Israel's foes. This is exactly my point. No one would be surprised to read such an article, but I suggest that many will be amazed by this one. Very few in the West have made grent claims of morality and rectitude on behalf of the P.L.O., of the kind with which Israel is lauded on a daily basis. Perhaps we may have succeeded in showing why we disagree with such praise and take a view which has puzzled so many.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

AQUARIUS (Jan 20 - Feb 18) Resist the temptation to go overboard where romance or spending is concerned. Any conflicts between your career interests and home life require sensitive handling. Consult loved ones.

PISCES (Feb. 19 - March 20) You have an opportunity to make your life more comfortable. Ask for what you want. A heart-to-heart talk with your mate will promote better understanding.

ARIES (March 21 - April 19) Your emotions could confuse you today. Take a crash course in diplomacy. Welcome a romantic opportunity this afternoon. Consider your loved one's feelings before making a major decision.

TAURUS (April 20 - May 20) The employment picture brightens. Cooperation is favored. Divine guidance plays a key role in distant affairs. Influential people become more accessible. The bottom line improves.

GEMINI (May 21 - June 20) Conflicting emotions make a decision difficult. Teamwork is essential to the success of your personal plans. All should go well in romance. Your social life becomes more glamorous.

CANCER (June 21 - July 22) Home improvements are worth the expense if they increase the value of your property. Visit someone confined to the hospital or nursing home. A new romance could prove long-lasting.

LEO (July 23 - Aug. 22) Obstacles can arise in legal negotiations or behind-the-scenes discussions. You may be worried about someone at a distance. Prepare for pending changes. Use the evening to gather your forces.

VIRGO (Aug. 23 - Sept. 22) The moment your thoughts turn negative, reverse them by imagining the opposite! A temporary cash shortage may cause concern. Revise your budget. A startling encounter may have great importance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 - Oct. 22) The winds of change are all about you. Keep a level head when confronted with the unexpected. A chance meeting may lead to big things! New faces brighten the social scene.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23 - Nov. 21) A coworker may be late or absent today, throwing a monkey wrench into your plans. Be flexible. Joint finances receive new attention. Make sure all parties clearly understand a contract.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22 - Dec. 21) Impractical thinking could land you in trouble. Do not promise to be in two places at one time. Seek constructive escapes if feeling restless. Look up friends you have not seen in a while.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22 - Jan. 19) Those in authority recognize a good thing when they hear it. Broadcast your ideas. You can make wise use of any extra funds. Do not take a loved one's criticism too personally.

Outstanding show by Vega

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Suzanne Vega
John M. Greene Hall
Tuesday, Oct. 10

Urgent and eloquent but seemingly more electric than in the past, Suzanne Vega played to a disappointingly small audience at Smith College two nights ago.

Vega's show could be termed a purist's pleasure. On a tour backing her latest album Days of Open Hand, released on A&M, she let loose with amazing intensity and depth on "Men in a War." Its terse lyrics and absorbing switches in tempos made the song a memorable one with Anton Sanko on synthesizer for the evening.

Review

From Days . . ., which seems darker than her two previous albums, she performed eight of 11 new songs as comfortably as if she had known them her whole life.

Real and personable not only in her music, Vega led into "Neighborhood Girls" from her self-titled LP, with a tale of a childhood confrontation with another girl and the misunderstanding that arose from differences in their pronunciations of "whore." Vega said the girl had accused her of calling her a "huaugh." Suddenly she recognized that the girl was trying to say "whore."

"I hadn't read a word like that up 'till then and if she had pronounced it like my second grade class did — "ho," — I would have known right away."

A few "lusty" bellows from the New Jersey natives in her audience preceded "Ironbound/Fancy Poultry" from Solitude Standing, set in Newark, N.J. "Some Journey" was a tribute to her composing talent.

Although Vega didn't vary much from her recorded sound, her music was as delving and fresh as ever playing two songs ("Luka," "Solitude Standing") that let mainstream listeners in on a secret a lot us knew already: Vega is the mistress of folk and abstract composition. She played "Left of Center" — of Pretty in Pink fame, while one member of the lethargic audience danced in the balcony.

Seated on a stool, she settled in for a riveting encore with "The Queen and the Soldier."

"Well the young queen she fixed him with an arrogant eye/She said you won't understand/And you may as well not try . . . I have swallowed a secret burning thread/It cuts me inside and often I've bled." Her talent twisted around "Beyond Belief," written by Elvis Costello. She finished off a royal night with "Tom's Diner" (minus the funk, which she reportedly likes!) and "Wooden Horse (Caspar Weinhauser's Song)."

Diane Possio opened with a powerful voice. Her lyrical content is admirable, but the musical content was a little 1970s/lounge-ish.

New releases bridge the jazz generation gap

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

A middle-aged musician said recently that in today's jazz scene, no one pays any attention to you unless you're under 30 or over 60 (or, I might add, dead). Unfortunately, that statement accurately describes the current flow of album releases, though there are exceptions.

To understand the truth in that remark, one need simply go into a record store and look at the preponderance of young, neotraditionalist prodigies in the new release bin. On the other side of the age range, the craze for reissues by old masters continues on. Fantasy, a conglomerate of mainstream labels, has two mammoth releases in the offing. The more important one is the complete set of recordings bassist Charles Mingus made for his own Debut label in the late 50s.

Debut was one of the first artist-owned labels in jazz. Through it, Mingus' music wasn't distributed very widely, yet it was some of the most exciting and challenging music of his career (indeed, in all of jazz history). It truly deserves wider recognition, and the 11-CD set should be a treat for those who can afford it.

The other Fantasy reissue project is more questionable. In 1977, self-styled impressario Norman Granz recorded the entire Montreux Jazz Festival (that's right, every note of it), which he designed with heavy emphasis on jam sessions between such veterans as Count Basie, Illinois Jacquet, Milt Jackson and Roy Eldridge. Granz felt that every note the artists on his Pablo label played should be enshrined on vinyl, so he recorded them unbelievably often — sometimes several albums per year. He reached a bombastic peak with this issue of well over a dozen albums from that one festival. Let's just hope that these artists (or their estates) receive fair royalties from the massive Montreux '77 reissue.

There are a few noteworthy exceptions to the current generation gap in jazz. One involves Donald Brown, a young Memphis-based pianist who uses three "middle-aged" front-line players — saxophonist Gary Bartz, trumpeter Eddie Henderson and bassist Buster Williams — on his new album, Sources of Inspiration (Muse). These are excellent players who, because they are mainly associated with the "evil" 70s, are unjustly out of vogue these days.

Brown himself exhibits writing and playing abilities that show more depth and personal identity than most of the other young prodigies. His playing has a solid blues base, and his writing is more substantial than the more usual "look what I learned in composition class last week" exercises.

The other "middle-ager" with a fine new release is baritone saxophonist Hamiet Bluiett, whose new album is Nali Kola (Soul Note). Like Bartz, Henderson and Williams, Bluiett was also active in the 70s (in the St. Louis avant-garde Black Artists Group, or BAG), but he is best known nowadays as a member of the World Saxophone Quartet. His baritone playing is firmly established as a more modern alternative to bop-era players like Pepper Adams or the "cool" sound of Gerry Mulligan.

On this new album, he enlists the aid of a group of African percussionists — sort of an ultimate antithesis of the rhythm-section-less WSQ — and the effect is stunning. The standout track is "Snake Back Solo," featuring the fire-breathing poetry reading of Quincy Troupe, who recently gained fame as the ghostwriter of Miles Davis' autobiography.

Homer-less Athletics sweep Sox out of World Series

By STEVE WILSTEIN
The Associated Press

Roger Clemens' pitching got him in trouble and his mouth got him thrown out in one of the quickest ejections in playoff history.

The fiery Boston pitcher flamed out of the AL playoffs in a rage yesterday, long before the rest of the Red Sox succumbed to a four-game sweep by the Oakland Athletics. The A's are the first team in 71 years to win a postseason series without hitting a home run and first to reach the World Series three straight times since the 1976-78 New York Yankees.

Clemens stood on the mound, preparing to pitch and swearing at homeplate umpire Terry Cooney when Cooney bolted from behind the plate and said he'd had enough abuse.

Cooney had not formally warned Clemens nor indicated that the pitcher might be facing ejection, if he did not stop the verbal berating. Instead, Cooney stepped from behind the plate and signaled the disbelieving Clemens out of the game with a flick of his thumb.

Clemens was pitching on three days rest despite a bout with tendinitis in his shoulder that has plagued him the past month. He threw hard but had trouble with his control before he was ejected. He managed only 24 strikes in 38 pitches and fell behind several batters.

He gave up a leadoff single to Ricky Henderson in the first inning before getting Dave Henderson to hit into a double play and Jose Canseco to ground out.

In the second inning, Carney Lansford singled to center with one out and Terry Steinbach followed with a single to the left. Lansford, running with the pitch, reached third and Steinbach took second when Mike Greenwell's throw from left skipped past third. Clemens backed up the ball and walked it back to the mound, fuming at himself or his teammates for his early predicament.

He fired a 95 mph strike to Mark McGuire, then got him to ground to short, scoring Lansford while Steinbach was tagged out at third.

Clemens then threw three straight balls to Willie Randolph before getting a strike, but walked him on the next pitch. As Mike Gallego came to the plate, Clemens stood on the mound, cursing Cooney for what Clemens felt were inconsistent calls.

After Clemens left — players, coaches and umpires stopped him from rushing at Cooney — Tom Bolton came in from the bullpen and gave up a two-run double to Gallego on his fourth pitch.

All three runs were charged to Clemens, who gave up three hits and a walk with no strikeouts in one and two-thirds innings.

Clemens gives cap to heckler

Oakland fan humored

OAKLAND (AP) — Roger Clemens gave his cap as he left the park to a 60-year-old Oakland fan who has ridiculed the Boston right-hander for seven years, after being ejected from Game 4 of the American League playoffs yesterday for cursing at home plate umpire Terry Cooney.

"We've been feuding for years," said Bob Northrup, of Napa, Calif.

"He's thrown coffee and Kool-Aid on me before. Oh, he's been so angry at me he's wanted to whip me."

But yesterday, as Clemens was given a police escort from the dugout to the clubhouse, he stopped and turned around. He walked over to Northrup, gave him his cap and walked away from an appreciative, clapping crowd.

The fans were chanting, "We want Clemens! We want Clemens!"

But Northrup had his own piece of Clemens.

"Actually, he was never really friendly to us until Tuesday," Northrup said. "He stopped and talked to me. I told him I have tickets for tomorrow, so go out and win the game. He signed a ball for me.

"Until that time, we were adversaries, more so than any other player in the American League."

"We've called him Butterbutt, Crisco Kid and Fat-in-the-Pan," said Ernie Nagy, who sits next to Northrup.

Why the sudden change of heart?

"I yelled at him as he was walking by (after the ejection)," Northrup said. "I said 'Lousy call, good game!' He went about 10 or 15 feet, turned around and gave me his cap.

"Then he said, 'See you next year.'"

Clemens was thrown out in the second inning, but remained in the dugout for an inning before leaving the clubhouse.

Northrup and Nagy said they have changed their minds about Clemens.

They may have something waiting for him on his next trip to Oakland.

"I'm going to give him a bottle of good Napa Valley wine," said Northrup.

Oakland swept the Sox for the AL pennant and are on the way to their third straight trip to the World Series.

Dave Stewart followed up his first-game heroics with an even better effort. He beat Boston 3-1 Wednesday and won for the eighth straight time in head-to-head competition with Clemens.

The only real question in Game 4 was how long Clemens could hold off Oakland. Pushing his shoulder on three days' rest to the bewilderment of much of Boston, the answer was not long at all.

The Athletics will begin defense of their World Series Championship Tuesday night against either Cincinnati or Pittsburg. The Reds lead the seven-game series 3-2.

X-country teams gear up for weekend

• Men's squad hits ECACs • Women host three teams

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team will send most of it's runners to Stanley Quarter Park in New Britain Connecticut on Saturday to compete in the Eastern Conference Meet.

Although the Minutemen sent their entire team to the Easterns last year, and won the meet handily, Coach Ken O'Brien usually uses this meet as a chance to rest his top runners for the bigger championship meets at the end of the season, and give some of the other runners on the squad a chance to "share the limelight up front" and gain some confidence for the later meets. O'Brien will employ that tactic again this year.

Despite the fact that several of his top runners will not be competing, O'Brien hopes his team can finish among the top five teams in the meet. He expects that the top three teams will be the University of Lowell, Keene State and Vermont. Those three teams finished second, third and fourth, respectively, in the meet last year. "If I had to make a guess, I would say that we can finish fourth as a team. If we could knock off one of those three teams and finish third if would be a very nice meet," O'Brien said.

Two runners who will compete for UMass on Saturday are Pat Ryan, who finished ninth in the Easterns last year, and Mike Davis, who finished 16th last year.

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team finishes its dual meet season this Saturday.

As UMass hosts New Hampshire, Vermont and Rhode Island, head coach Julie LaFreniere is looking to finish the season in style.

"If our runners are healthy, we should win the meet," said LaFreniere. "The problem now is getting them healthy."

UMass is being plagued by the flu bug. Important runners Michele St. Laurent and Mo Meldrim both are sick. The bug affected St. Laurent in the meet last Saturday when she posted a sub-par performance.

"Being sick definitely affected her time," said LaFreniere. "Right now I am hoping Mo and Michelle can get healthy and not spread the illness to the rest of the team."

As for the competition this weekend, LaFreniere is unsure.

"New Hampshire and Vermont are not the same as last year. They both have lost most of their talent to graduation. Rhode Island does have two runners who should compete with our top three. Vermont, I know very little about but they won't lie down and let us win easily."

In addition to staying illness free, LaFreniere is looking for Becky Johnson to return to form.

Kylish out for West Virginia game

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts men's soccer defensive back Todd Kylish will miss Friday's game at West Virginia due to a one-game suspension mandated by NCAA rules, according to coach Jeff Gettler.

Rule 6-17 of the 1990 NCAA men's and women's soccer rules states, "Any player who has received a total of five cautions or ejections in one season shall not compete in the next regularly scheduled game, including tournament games," confirmed by David Smale, publications editor at NCAA headquarters in Overland Park, KN.

Kylish received his fifth yellow card of the season in last Sunday's 1-1 overtime tie at Rhode Island.

"Losing Kylish hurts us dramatically," Gettler said. "He's started every game, and he's been winning balls in the air consistently for us." Matt Edgerly will replace Kylish in the backfield against WVU.

With roughly two-thirds of the regular season played, junior forward Brett Anthony leads the Minutemen with eight points. Anthony has three goals and two assists. Close behind with seven points is senior Peter McEvoy. McEvoy has one goal and five assists, most resulting from cross-field passes.

The Minutemen are still among the conference leaders in defense. They are third in goals allowed with 15, and goalkeepers John Gruber and Steve Armenti both own goals-against averages among the conference's top ten.

In other conference news, Rutgers moved back into first place in the A-10 last night by defeating Temple 3-0. That win gives the Scarlet Knights a record of 5-1 with 15 points, two better than Penn State. The Nittany Lions (4-1-), who had moved into first a few weeks back by drubbing Rutgers 3-0, did not play a conference game last night. Temple, who had won eight straight until yesterday, holds onto third place with a record of 3-1. They have nine points.

Benefit concert to aid children of detained and injured political activists

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

The United States government regularly incarcerates American citizens who have made conscious political decisions to oppose the United States federal and state government policies.

The Center for Constitutional Rights in New York City has documented the cases of over 100 political prisoners. The Center maintains that of these 100 prisoners, there are approximately 70 dependent children who lack sufficient care.

In addition, progressive political activists have sustained serious to fatal injuries while fighting for their particular causes. Their children face extraordinary pressures and hardships — some are being raised by single parents, some have no contact with family members at all.

In 1957, the United States government ordered the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg for allegedly giving atomic secrets to the Soviets. Following their initial arrest in 1953, their two children, Robert and Michael, spent nine months in an orphanage, until they were taken in by friends of their parents.

The children, then six and 10 respectively, were moved from New York to New Jersey. Soon after the move, authorities seized the children and placed them back in an orphanage, falsely claiming that they were being abused and used as "political pawns" for their parents.

Eventually, the children were returned to the couple and adoption procedures were finalized. To avoid further persecution from the government, the children assumed their adoptive parents' surname, Meeropol.

In September 1990, Robert Meeropol started the Rosenberg Fund for Children to provide financial assistance to children whose parents have been imprisoned, killed or seriously injured because of their progressive political activities.

Through the Rosenberg Fund, progressive professionals and institutions will be awarded grants to provide needy children with educational and psychological services at no or reduced cost.

Tomorrow evening, musicians Pete Seeger, Richie Havens, Jane Sapp and Country Joe McDonald will travel to Northampton to perform a benefit concert for the fund.

"I came up with the idea for the organization back in 1975, when my brother and I reopened my parents' case," Meeropol said. "We sued the government under the Federal Information Act, and naively I thought we'd get a lot of money and we could start this organization. Unfortunately, that didn't happen."

The organization had been in the planning stages since Sept. 4, 1990, when it finally became a reality. The Fund is currently in the process of applying for tax exempt and tax deductible status as a public foundation and is now a project of the Alternative Media Information Center.

"This is the first benefit for the Fund," Meeropol explained. "These are the first monies being gathered."

For more information about the Rosenberg Fund for Children write: 1145 Main St., Suite 304, Springfield, MA., 01103.

Pete Seeger, Richie Havens, Jane Sapp and Country Joe McDonald will be appearing at John M. Greene Hall at Smith College on Friday, Oct. 12 at 8 p.m. Tickets are still available and are $20 in advance, $22 at the door and $16 for students and senior citizens. For ticket sales and information call (413) 781-1406, 8 p.m.-4p.m.

Folk noise trio

Cordelia's Dad, the Amherst-based band is neither folk, nor rock but since labels seem to be a key to existence for bands, guitarist Tom King calls the trio's music "folk noise." Their name is from Shakespeare. Ties to the Old English fade in the breeze here, but their music tends to be traditional. They've opened for the Dead Milkmen, The Washington Squares, Miracle Legion and Scruffy the Cat, among others. They're back and they're fantastic!

You can catch them at Pearl Street tonight in Northampton at the competitive price of $4. The show starts at 8:30 p.m. with Savage Garden. Show is 18-and-over. Don't pass this up.

Proposal to cut 14 UM departments

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY
Collegian Staff

The administration announced yesterday a proposal to reduce and eliminate 14 academic programs at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which is expected to be put into effect for the 1991 fall semester.

Speaking at a capacity-filled Faculty Senate meeting, Provost Richard O'Brien named the programs selected for termination and reduction.

Programs slated for reductions include:

● Germanic Languages and Literatures, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Italian, Plant Pathology, Entomology, Resource Economics, Nursing, and in the School of Education, Research and Evaluation, Educational Policy and Administration and Cultural Diversity and Curriculum Reform.

The four programs slated for elimination:

● Professional Preparation in the School of Physical Education, Community Health Education in School of Public Health, and in the School of Education, Organization Development and Staff Development programs.

Reduction and termination of targeted departments will save the University approximately $2 million in the next fiscal year, President-Chancellor Duffey said. He added, however, that this figure may be imprecise due to uncertain faculty projections.

The bulk of reductions and eliminations will be absorbed by the School of Education. Dean of School of Education Marilyn Haring-Hidore said that because administrators focused on preserving undergraduate programs, her school with its large graduate student enrollment, was struck the hardest.

"Doctoral students worked against us in that regard, grads are our focus. The undergraduate program is a laboratory for us," she said. "Several of the state colleges have education programs, I have no intention of duplicating state college efforts."

Haring-Hidore said she plans an intense "persuasive" campaign to overturn the proposal. All departments will have an opportunity to appeal to the administration for reevaluation.

The individual programs slated for reduction will be reduced by no more than 40 percent of their current size, said Provost Richard O'Brien, who planned the proposal action with four other administrators.

O'Brien said that the administration will not break contracts with the tenured faculty in the programs slated for reductions. However, in the programs slated for elimination, tenured faculty will be subject to termination.

He repeated several times during the meeting that the reduction and elimination of programs should not be viewed as "a comment on their quality," and in no way signifies that they are "bad."

The criteria for reduction included program's undergraduate student-faculty ratio and research productivity. Similar criteria was used to evaluate elimination proposals, with an additional consideration of "centrality to the mission of the University or reputation, or intellectual liveliness."

In contrast to the often stolid Senate meeting, several faculty members were outraged at the proposal.

Professor Ted Chen, from the Community Health Education program which is slated for elimination, said after

As part of a national celebration of sexual identification, approximately 200 lesbians, bisexuals, gays and heterosexual allies from the University of Massachusetts community gathered at the Student Union Ballroom to participate in the third annual Coming Out Day.

Activities included several films and documentaries about gay, lesbian, and bisexual life, as well as the construction of a quilt of "coming out" stories which is to be displayed in a few months, according to Amy Lesen, a member of the steering committee of the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance.

Lesen said the quilt, which will be used for Gay Pride marches when completed, was the brainchild of Margaret Arseneault, the alliance's advisor from the Student Activities Office.

The quilt features 100 lavender and pink triangles with messages on them, ranging from statements about "coming out," the process of revealing one's sexual identity, and celebrating the 20th anniversary of the LBGA, to tributes to those who have died of AIDS.

The LBGA, the oldest campus gay organization, sponsored the events.

Lesen said the atmosphere during the day was upbeat. "Everyone's really up on Coming Out Day," she said. "I wish everyone could be up like this everyday."

Sophomore Kelly Hayes said that she felt students should not have to live in fear because of their sexuality.

"I think it's awesome," she said, "although I really wish it didn't have to happen."

Jason McDonald, a freshman member of the LBGA, said Coming Out Day is not be the only form of action for the Students charge administration with racism

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Students from two departments in the School of Education are charging University of Massachusetts administrators with racism in their decision to target those departments for elimination, despite claims from administrators to the contrary.

The Staff Development and the Organizational Development programs in the School of Education were slated for possible elimination by the administration at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting.

According to Blossom Burton, a doctoral candidate in the School of Education, the two departments have the highest minority enrollment on campus. She said the University has specifically targeted those programs because of high minority enrollment.

"If these eliminations go through the University will have a very difficult time recruiting and keeping minority students," she said.

She added that 67 percent of the African-American faculty on campus are in the School of Education.

Evon Walters, a second-year graduate student in the Staff Development program said the Organizational Development Program at UMass is on of the few in the nation that emphasizes the need for multiculturalism.

He said that the stress on multiculturalism is impor-

Question five to eliminate $800M from state spending

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The impact that ballot question number three will have on the public higher education has been estimated and repeatedly denounced by higher education officials, politicians and students statewide.

However, there has been virtually no discussion on what impact ballot question number five would have on state-allocated funding of public higher education.

Question number five is a referendum motion that would allocate 40 percent of selected tax revenues to local aid in fiscal year 1992.

State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) has estimated by using figures from the current state budget that question five would shift $800 million in discretionary monies from state to local spending.

"Question five will have a similar effect on state agencies on line accounts as question three, with half of the impact," he said.

Ballot question number three, the Citizens for Limited Taxation rollback petition, has been estimated to cut $1.4 billion from $4.4 billion allocated for legislative discretionary spending.

Legislators use discretionary monies to fund human services programs, public higher education and roads and bridges. The administration of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst estimated the University would lose $28 million in state allocations if CLT passes.

Any cuts caused by question five would take effect in July of 1992.

Paul Moran, the spokeperson for the Massachusetts Municipal Association, a lobbyist organization who drafted the bill, said question five is direct legislation to dedicate 40 percent of all sales, corporate excise and income taxes directly to local aid.

"We want to depoliticize the whole issue of local aid," he said. "There will be discretionary spending cuts and cuts to local aid no matter what happens since the [state budget] pie is shrinking."

Local aid comprises funding for public schools, police and fire departments and services such as trash disposal.

"We need to protect local services," he said. "At least 85 percent of average person in Massachusetts depends on these services."

Moran said he could not estimate the exact amount of discretionary funding which question five would entail since the referendum would take effect in 1992 for which there are no base figures.

Terry Zoulas, the press secretary for the Board of Regents of Higher Education, said the regents have not investigated what the impact of question five on public higher education state funding because their prime concern is the immediate impact of question three.

"What the voters will do is unknown," tant because it mirrors the changing demographics in the workforce. He said the Staff Development program was equally important because of the cultural diversity of the program.

Marilyn Haring-Hidore, dean of the School of Education, said her school leads the University in respect to diversity. She said she is "very proud" of the role of the school.

She refuted charges of racism that some education graduates and faculty were charging.

"I am not willing to say it is racial," she said. "I am willing to say it will hurt diversity at this University and this school."

Provost O'Brien, in response to one of the first questions from faculty senators, said the cuts were not racially motivated and the programs selected were looked in relation to centrality — or the mission of the campus. He said they also looked at the student/faculty ratio and some aspects of cultural diversity.

O'Brien added that there was no racial bias "in any way against minorities [in the decisions]. He said there were "no targets."

Zoulas said. "We could lose billions of dollars and then have to give 40 percent to cities and towns."

The Department of Revenue has also not estimated what the impact would be on state discretionary accounts if question five passes.

"As question five is written, we have had problems with interpreting what will be included," she said.

Moran conceded that there were certain oversights in the language of the referendum question which will be adapted.

homosexual and bisexual community.

He also charged that the administration is covering up incidents of homophobic violence on campus.

'I'm not going to see any further incidents go unrecognized on this campus," he said. "But I need the help of my allies [both gay and straight]."

Among the students who came to share their experiences through participation in the quilt project was Buzz Harris, a resident assistant in John Adams Residence Hall. He said that by coincidence, he was going to hold a floor meeting that night and tell his fellow residents that he was gay.

Harris noted that several residents have suspected that he is gay, but so far, he said, "no one has said a word to me about it." He added that to most of the students, his sexuality does not matter to them.

Harris was also a Washington organizer for the October 11, 1987 gay rights march on the nation's capital, from which the Coming Out Day was started. "It was one of the most amazing experiences of my life," he said.

He said that marching with hundreds of thousands of gay men, lesbians, bisexuals and allies made him feel as if he was part of the majority of the population, rather than an oppressed minority.

"There was a tremendous feeling of comfort," Harris said. "It was like being part of a huge family."

A rally was held earlier in the day on the Student Union steps to commemorate Coming Out Day, and included speakers such as Rob Ranney, of UMass Gay and Lesbian Alumni/ae, and Felice Yeskel of the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

Rappaport offers to bring new ideas to Senate

By KELLY CONGDON
Collegian Staff

Republican candidate for United States Senate James Rappaport advises not to vote for him if you're willing to accept the status quo in Massachusetts.

Rappaport said he offers an opportunity for change and new ideas with a common sense approach to government uncharacteristic of the current administration.

Despite the predominately Democratic makeup of the state, Rappaport feels he can defeat incumbent John Kerry. "I've seen a change in politics in Massachusetts. The legacy of liberal Democrats has left many casualties, especially the working class people of this state," Rappaport said. "I don't think the people of Massachusetts are going to endorse the status quo anymore," Rappaport maintained. "John Kerry is a product of the Dukakis administration and the adverse effects it had on this state.

A graduate of the Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania and Boston University Law School, he said one of his foremost concerns is the quality of education.

"The number one determinant of income in this country is age and the second is the education level a person attains," Rappaport said.

"Education is the only resource people have control of to obtain higher income and escape poverty. It's imperative that we give every member of society access to education," he stated.

Rappaport said, if elected, he intends to pose several policy proposals aimed at improving education on all levels. "I recognize that people want access to affordable higher education, but it's an unrealistic expectation considering the poor quality of first and secondary education we're offering the nation's youth," Rappaport said.

"I think we have to confront this problem as well as addressing the need of higher education," he said.

Rappaport stated his greatest asset is his ability to represent moderate, conservative and Republican voters. His pro-choice stance on the abortion issue is one facet where Rappaport hopes to gain mainstream support in November. "The point is, I'm pro-choice because I believe people should be individually accountable for their actions and accept the consequences of their decisions," Rappaport said.

"The government should not make a choice that is clearly up to the individual. However, I think my role as a leader is to convince people to make the most responsible choice," he said.

Rappaport also intends to make a greater impact on curtailing drug use than his opponent. "It's important to demonstrate that the people will not stand for drug pushers poisoning the lives of our children," Rappaport claimed.

Rappaport cited government provision of sterile needles to intravenous drug as sending a "mixed message" about the government's commitment to the war on drugs.

"How can we be perceived as serious about the drug war if we're slapping the wrists of drug lords with one hand and passing out needles with the other?" he said.

Currently Rappaport is a member of the Massachusetts Republican Party Finance Committee and the Chairman of the Massachusetts Taxpayers Committee, which supports fiscally responsible legislative candidates.

Marching band affected by budget crisis

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Correspondent

Perhaps the first major victim of the recent freeze on non-payroll subsidiaries will be inadvertent — The University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band.

Already committed to a number of scheduled performances this fall, the Marching Band suddenly found itself without funds on the first of the month because of President-Chancellor Duffey's announced freeze on "all non-payroll subsidiaries" for a number of accounts, including non-directed alumni funds.

According to the Chancellor's memorandum circulated among deans, directors, and department heads, "This action is effective immediately and shall remain in effect until the extent of this latest financial setback is determined and appropriate budget adjustments have been made to campus accounts to reflect the financial plan to cope with these reductions."

For the Marching Band, time could be the decision-maker for their fall season, even if none of their alumni funds are actually cut.

"Obviously we stand to lose lots of funds — 80 percent of our budget comes from non-directed alumni funds," George Parks, Director of the Minuteman Marching Band said.

Parks said the main concern of the band at the moment was getting to engagements for the rest of the season.

"We're not sure yet what the impact of the freeze will be — but a big question for us is that by the time it's resolved, our season is over. We have already made commitments, it's like a big cloud hanging over us. We're not sure how we're going to function," he added.

Parks said an immediate problem for the band, which numbers around 400 students, is their appearance at a New York Giants game this month.

"This trip is less than two weeks away," Parks said, "and we're not sure we can go," he said.

Professors establish Write Now!

Company founded to enhance business students' writing skills

By STEPHEN DAMIANI
Collegian Correspondent

In response to a growing need for better business writing, two University of Massachusetts professors have founded a company called Write Now! Business Education Services.

Since the advent of computers, fax machines and videoculture, the methods by which information and ideas are shared have changed forever, according to Michael Egan, a University professor and president of Write Now!. However, the written word continues to be an integral part of everyday business and interpersonal communication, he said.

According to a recent survey done by Roger Flax, president of a management firm in New Jersey, many executives and managers spend an average of 21 percent of their time writing business letters, memos and reports.

These activities can add up to one day a week, or 11 work weeks a year, the survey said.

"Anyone in any field needs to communicate in writing, and a lot of business people don't have confidence in their ability to write," Egan said. "These are very bright people with a general lack of skill.

"However, these people are very capable, and business writing is a learnable skill," he added.

Studies have shown that an employee's writing ability directly correlates with promotion, he said. Business people cannot assume that progressing in a company will enable them to hand over their writing assignments to subordinates.

"As people rise in the hierarchy, the more they have to deal with writing," he said.

The company provides a course which uses sophisticated computer software designed by Write Now!'s co-founder, Dimitri Gat. Gat taught technical writing at the University for 13 years, has written eight successful novels and is currently an independent writing consultant.

A former journalist and business owner, Egan holds a Ph.D from Cambridge University and has taught in England and the U.S. for more than 20 years.

The course offers strategies that will enable a reader to "move" through the copy with ease and comprehension. Students learn "how to grab someone's attention, hold it, and get the message across," Egan said.

Egan and Gat knew that the classes for Write Now! would be attended predominantly by business professionals, so the two performed extensive research to better understand how adults assimilate new material, Egan said.

"Adults learn differently than, say, college or high school students," he said. "They require an atmosphere of greater acceptance and approval, which is what we offer at Write Now!," he said.

The learning atmosphere is "fun" and "not stuffy," Egan said. The instructors stress participation, interaction, positive reinforcement and step-by-step guidelines and checklists.

Since its inception, Write Now! has enjoyed much success from local businesses and corporations, all seeking improved written communications.

Egan has offered to instruct a version of Write Now! at UMass but he did not know if it would be available for students anytime soon.

Barry Commoner praises environmental groups' efforts

By PETER HERING
Collegian Correspondent

Referring to environmental pollution as an "incurable disease," Dr. Barry Commoner, often referred to as the father of the ecological movement, spoke to an assembled crowd at Hampshire College last night.

Commoner began by praising the efforts of environmental groups and the citizens of this country, which have led the world in producing an awareness among all other nations.

"We have accomplished quite a bit in the last 20 years," Commoner said, referring to the years since the first Earth Day in 1970. "We have passed many new laws protecting the environment, and we have taken giant steps in creating an awareness among the people of the world."

Commoner, 73, is a graduate of Harvard University and author of several books, including his most recent, Making Peace with the Planet. Commoner believes that the root of the environmental problem lies in a failure to develop a proper approach to pollution prevention.

"Pollution controls aren't effective, but pollution prevention is," stated Commoner. "We must stop the production of a pollutant altogether. If it's not in the environment then it can't be harmful."

Commoner is convinced that the role of big business has been instrumental in the decline of the environment. He believes that in areas such as farming, the need for production of more goods has driven farmers into using chemicals that, although yielding more crops, prove to be devastating to the environment.

"We must introduce a switch to environmentally sound technologies, even if this results in a small drop in productivity."

Commoner agreed that the costs in establishing alternative energy sources would be high, but that the broader consequences of the environment should take precedence.

"The government must get involved in producing a healthier and friendlier environment for the people of this earth," argued Commoner.

"There are alternative energy sources, such as solar power, which can be used in fueling our homes, our cars and so much more. The untapped potential is overwhelming," he said.

Commoner sees the current laws governing environmental pollution as hypocritical. He said the Environmental Protection Agency is headed in the wrong direction. He said EPA laws are all based on allowing pollution to occur.

"It seems that the EPA doesn't come into effect until a certain pollutant is discovered," he said.

"Then it becomes part of the environment, with the EPA setting a standard for what form of the pollutant is acceptable," Commoner said. "We have to make sure that these pollutants never reach the environment to begin with."

Speaker denounces DOD funding

Dr. Susan Wright

By MARK HENSELY
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Susan Wright, a professor of physics at the University of Michigan, denounced the continued Department of Defense funding of biological weapons research and suggested methods to reduce the existence and development of such technology.

In a speech last night at Amherst College, Wright proclaimed that biological weapons research is justified by the Pentagon as being strictly aimed at the development of vaccines for defense purposes, yet in reality, the nature of the vaccines themselves make them inherently ineffective in defensive applications.

The sheer logistics of immunizing entire populations, she claimed, would render the vaccines useless.

Instead, she said that any vaccines which are developed by the research and proven to be effective against biological weapons, will more likely be used to immunize offensive armies operating in contaminated areas.

"Pursuing a perfect defense against biological weapons," she said, "is not only futile, but it is likely to foster the development of offensive biological weapons."

She went on to say that the Pentagon itself has effectively admitted that these research programs "are absolutely incapable of protecting civilian populations."

Looking to the future of biological weapons, Wright said much depends on the outcome of the Middle East crisis and the relationship between Israel and the other Arab states.

Because Israel is thought to possess nuclear weapons, the Arab states believe they need chemical weapons to counter this threat.

"Unfortunately the deterrence mentality that the U.S. has been promoting since 1945 is now being adopted by the Middle East countries," she said.

In the event of a peaceful solution to the current Middle East crisis, Wright outlined what she think needs to be done to put an end to biological weapons. She placed the responsibility in the hands of national governments, scientists, and citizens.

Governments need to eliminate the loopholes in biological weapons treaties and work, within the context of a trusting political atmosphere, towards a New World Order, she said.

Secondly, she called on scientists to "be far more aware and think far more energetically about the relationship between science and society."

Finally, she urged citizens to convince their representatives to speak out against and work for the elimination of biological weapons research.

The speech was the second in a series sponsored by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies entitled "Missles and Germs: The New Weapons of Mass Destruction."

Get set for Youssou

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

Audiences may be familiar with the name Youssou N'Dour via Amnesty International's "Human Rights Now!" world tour, or by his tour after the release of So with Peter Gabriel, or by his own rights throughout Africa and Europe. However you've come to know Youssou N'Dour, you'll agree that he has emerged from his roots a bona fide star and will someday, if not now, be found in the rankings of Bob Marley.

Born in Dakar in 1959, he first took to the stage at 12-years-of-age and soon became known as "Dakar's Little Prince." He sang with the Star Band in Senegal during his mid-teens and in 1979, he put together his own ensemble — Etoile de Dakar, which evolved into the Super Etoile de Dakar. He continues to lead this group, now one of the best dance bands in West Africa.

Youssou stated: "I'm a new generation of African music. When I started to play music I was playing traditional music, I didn't understand any other except maybe Cuban.

"But when I came to Europe I listened to the sounds around me, and by 84 I had a new attitude. I wanted to mix some of what I heard back into what I grew up hearing. I'm African, yes, but I like to play music for everybody. But my identity is African — that will never change."

Set, steeped with tradition and openness captures a fresh feel from his band, simultaneously showing off Youssou's multi-talented voice and ever-expanding songwriting abilities.

Michael Brook, producer of Set (frequent collaborator with Daniel Lanois and Brian Eno, former guitarist with avant-jazz trumpeter Jon Hassell), and Youssou captured the "mbalax" sound that the band has developed — a rhythmic mix from Dakar's markets and housing complexes, its nightclubs and impromptu block parties.

"Toxiques" is a potent song about the exporting of hazardous waste to Third World countries with the complicity of the governments of those countries. Producer/performer Daniel Lanois (U2, Peter Gabriel, the Neville Brothers, Bob Dylan) helped out, adding his own touches to this song.

The Medina, where Youssou was born and has always lived is a bustling popular quarter of Dakar and his pleasures of home and place are captured in the folk-like hymn "Medina." Filled with lively moral exhoration, the album's title track "Set" is already a major dance hit in Senegal. It means "clean" in Wolof, Senegal's dominant language.

To listen to Youssou is to open yourself to a world, literally, of talent and culture. Exciting and optimistic, it assures itself to be one of the most notable and electric shows to travel to the Valley this year.

Youssou N'Dour will be appearing at the Iron Horse tomorrow night for two shows at 7 p.m. and 10 p.m. Tickets are $17.50 in advance.

Walk in the Woods offers a friendly evening of alienation

By THOMAS SCULLY

Walk in the Woods
Hampshire College
Wednesday, Oct. 3

Walk in the Woods by Lee Blessing will probably be remembered as one of the finest plays of the past decade, written partly as a response to the nuclear weapons buildup of the Reagan era, but still maintaining an understated and multi-layered relevance today.

According to Allan Krass's program notes: One drizzly afternoon in 1982, arms negotiators Paul Nitze of the United States and Yuli Kvitsinsky of the Soviet Union took a walk alone in the Geneva woods to draft their own, unauthorized arms reduction treaty — which was never ratified by either of their governments.

The two-man play is a brilliantly developed conversation between a fictional Soviet and American arms negotiator. In four tightly knit scenes spanning the course of a year, the two men are united by their common hope for peace and the hope of all humanity, despite being divided by their hostile cultures and societies lurking just beyond the woods in the form of officious reporters and inscrutable heads of state.

The dialogue keeps up a repartee of humor and clever reversals, which make for a most enjoyable night out. Out, in fact, in the forest, for the play is produced (by Stone Han) in the wood outside Emily Dickinson Hall. The baroque music for clarinet and flute and the warm air picnic baskets made me feel like I was watching summer Shakespeare in the park. It is delightfully symbolic in a nonchalant, painless sort of way, to see the vast superpowers brought to this small measure, sitting side by side on a unremarkable bench among the autumn trees. The boyish American upstart John Honeyman (played by Gregory Berlowitz) perches primly on the west end in a dark blue suit, contrasted sharply with the more rotund, slouching, grey old Ruski Andrey Botvinnik (Barry Weil), planted on the east end of the bench, a mixture of irascible cynicism and equally imperturbable childishness.

The acting is sometimes uneven, groping somewhat for comic timing when it should seem accidental, occasionally shifting emotional temperament unexpectedly. Barry

REVIEW

Weil as Andrey tries a bit much for the Russian wag, mugging with too readable eyebrows and lips like a cartoon Gorbachev. And if Weil pushes too hard, it can be said that Gregory (John Honeyman) pushes too little in the moments when he is supposed to be truly angry and not just priggish.

Still, on the whole they are an entertaining pair who play off each other well. They have some delightful moments: a subdued double take by Gregory, the angry stiffening of Barry's shoulder, a tense juncture where the actors seem to transcend the script.

Chris Werler's staging is surprisingly dynamic considering there are only two people and a bench, though it was a distracting when Gregory Berlowitz's hair would get caught in the tree branches down right.

Yet beyond all this good natured — and admittedly stereotypical — banter between east and west, there is a very dismal, nihilistic undertone. Visually they and we are "in the woods," our whole civilization, in fact, our whole planet, receding in the blackness of space to the size of a fingertip. The emptiness in the heart of the American midwest where all the I.C.B.M. missile silos are based is the emptiness within ourselves, the emotional void that we need to fill up with irrational machines of destruction.

"We have never known such excitement in the history of humankind," Andrey tells us.

The conflict of the play is whether we should keep on trying in the nuclear age at all, or whether the appropriate action is simply be frivolous and trivial. Andrey begins the last scene by exclaiming, "This will be the final, glorious touch," but it is not any arms reduction treaty he is talking about, it is a flower that he is putting in his absurd little schoolgirl's bouquet. The American came only for an agreement but the Soviet wants to be friends first.

Chris Werler, a third-year Hampshire student, started his own company, Hampshire Independent Productions, to produce his own vision of what theatre should be.

"Nobody ever considers the audience anymore," Werler said. "People go to the intellectual theatre and they say, 'I'm watching this because I'm supposed to be understanding it,' Yes, I want to teach them something that makes me feel just plain bad, then I feel guilty, and that feeling makes me resent this thing I'm watching."

The only way we can deal with such huge issues as nuclear apocalypse is to be playful. "If you stay here long enough, the only thing one can enjoy is a totally meaningless conversation," Andrey explains to Honeyman, though he is really talking about the audience living in a totally nuclear age. "Our time together has been a very great failure," he says, "but a successful one."

Replacements shake things up with All Shook Down

The Replacements
All Shook Down

Paul Westerberg and The Replacements must have realized what went wrong. After their watered-down disappointing release last year, they have returned with a fresh sound. No longer are they outwardly seeking success. Instead they have created a relaxed, yet exciting LP entitled All Shook Down.

Paul Westerberg takes us with him on his emotional roller coaster, as he uses biting lyrics to display his feelings. This is typified in the song "My Little Problem" where Sonny and Cher are put to rest. Westerberg gives the opposing viewpoint to "I've Got You Babe" in this blistering duet by howling the question, "Don't you want to be my little problem?" Sometimes I wonder whether Westerberg is really Bob Dylan (don't laugh — has anyone ever seen them in the same room?).

Another cynical song is "Nobody," which reflects Westerberg's rejection of marriage vows. Later in the album, he accepts his image in the autobiographical "Attitude." In this song he looks back at his life singing about — you guessed it — his attitude.

At this point, you are probably wondering why this article is about Paul Westerberg. This time around, all 13 songs on the album are written by him, and he seems to carry the direction of the band. As for the other musicians, they do more than hold their own on All Shook Down. Tommy Stinson, Chris Mars, and Slim Dunlap each show their ability on their instruments, and work together with Westerberg as a tight unit.

REVIEW

Unfortunately, it looks as though Westerberg is still doubtful about the continuation of the band. "The Last," which is an improved version of "Nightclub Jitters," shows his mixed emotions. In his own style, he shows this in the words, "This one's your last chance to make this last one really . . . the last." He does admit toward the end of the song that the last "one" was also intended as "the last."

There are many moments on this album where things loosen up completely. "Merry Go Round" and "Attitude" serve as good examples of this. In "Someone Take the Wheel," another highlight is reached, as Westerberg exclaims, "I don't care where we're going."

Throughout the album, a series of guest performers are heard, adding horns and strings, among other instruments, to many of the songs. On the acoustic "Torture" there is a great, but all too short harmonica solo, seldom heard on any Replacements release. The abundance of guest performers could make you wonder how they will reproduce these songs live. Most who have seen them know that if they are in the mood, anything can sound good.

All Shook Down is a good-feeling album. Most Replacements fans are probably worried about it. No, there are no real scorchers comparable to "Favorite Thing," "IOU," or "I'll be You." On the other hand, the album is not dreary, a major disappointment with Don't Tell a Soul. Most of the relaxed songs still have up-beat undertones. Listen to it once or twice — you may end up leaving it in your stereo for weeks.

Mould succeeds with new LP

By JASON EZEKIEL
Collegian Correspondent

Bob Mould
Black Sheets of Rain
Virgin

Black Sheets of Rain, Bob Mould's recently released second solo album has taken the alternative music scene by surprise. His latest single, "It's too Late," has been getting a lot of airplay on alternative music stations such as WFNX 101.7 in Boston, and has reportedly been seen on the trendy medium, MTV. It is not the bestselling record on the market, but money wise it is a big improvement over his last endeavor, Workbook, which did not sell that well.

Mould is the former singer/songwriter/guitarist for the now defunct Husker Du. In the early 80s, Husker Du was the average hardcore-punk band playing at clubs and getting little more than local support. After a couple of albums, they decided to change their style of music. Most critics believe that the landmark album Zen Arcade bridged the gap between hardcore-punk and alternative music.

REVIEW

For those not familiar with the afore mentioned terms, Husker Du's sound falls somewhere between The Cult and R.E.M. They paved the way for many other hardcore-punk bands, like Dag Nasty and Lemonheads, to move towards that undefinable alternative sound. They had built up a cult following during their peak and many people were disappointed by their angry breakup.

Fans went for a couple of years without anything new from the former bandmembers (barring a 12' single released by the drummer). In early 1989 Mould's first solo album, Workbook was released. It was a good record, but fans were a little disapointed.

Workbook did not have the power or the edge that Mould's former releases had while he was with Husker Du. It contained a few hard tunes like "Wishing Well" and "Whichever Way The Wind Blows," but the album was basically a collection of acoustic songs about getting old and living in small towns. The record did show a big effort on the part of Mould, but it left old fans wanting and did not arouse much new interest.

Later on in 1989 Grant Hart, Mould's former bandmember, released his first solo album entitled Intolerence. Hart was the singer/songwriter/drummer for the old band. He always tended to write smoother and less complex music. Compared to Mould's sometimes twangy, at other times airy vocal style, Hart's voice is much more consistent and smooth. Intolerance was filled with upbeat drum rhythms and pleasing vocal tracks, but lacked the guitar skill and edge of the old band. With all the controversy over the breakup and Hart's alleged drug addiction, it was given that Husker Du was no more than a pleasant memory. In this particular case the whole was bigger than the sum of its parts. The separated band's coleaders couldn't produce the effect they had together. Hart was experimenting with a keyboard based sound and Mould was pounding out music that was acoustic guitar, raspy bass and reflective lyrics. The public was anxiously awaiting something to whet their unsatiable appetite for that Husker Du sound.

Black Sheets of Rain overwhelmed Husker Du's fans with powerful and passionate music that puts previous releases of the former bandmembers to shame. Mould brings his new band together with his newest release. The edge sound is back. There are a couple of mellow songs like "The Last Night," but this album has its focus on the power and complexity of the old band. Mould does not regress to rewriting old tunes, rather he integrates the old sound of guitar with unique and more modern melodies.

With the release of the first single, "It's too Late," Mould recaptures the old fans and stimulates a new following. The single could easily pass for a forgotten Husker Du b-side of an old seven inch, yet with a close listen one is able to distinguish that the song has a more modern feel that evolved from the Husker Du sound. Compared to the first single of the last album, which was "See a Little Light," it grabbed many more people's attention. It was danceable, yet it had the power the first lacked. The bass guitar was clearer, the electric guitar more intense, and the vocals went through a spectrum of different styles. When the record was released (not long after the release of the single), the record company was a lot more optimistic, as far as sales were concerned, due to the unexpected popularity the single.

This new album is almost a book of music with a central theme and songs that substitute for chapters. The opening track, "Black Sheets of Rain" introduces the listener to the new/old Bob Mould and gives one the feel for the powerful music that is coming.

The next song, "Stand Guard," reinforces the complexity of Bob Mould's style of singing. The transition is a little shaky into "It's too Late," but since this is the single the listener is put at ease. One gets that, "Ahh, a song that I recognize, now I don't have to put forth so much effort into listening" feeling from "It's too Late," thus the placement is justified.

The following two songs, "One Good Reason" and "Stop Your Crying," respectively, compete for the title of "most powerful song on the album."

The second side begins with the thought music of "Hanging Tree" and comes to an explosive and almost angry conclusion in "Sacrifice/Let There Be Peace" which skillfully ends the album with the suggestion that it is far from concluded.

Skip Heads Up

By PAUL DeGEORGES
Collegian Correspondent

Heads Up
Soul Brother Crisis Intervention Embargo

"Corny Style Pizza," the latest single from Heads Up's new album Soul Brother Crisis Intervention steals its style unabashedly from Jane's Addiction, right down to actually lifting lyrics directly out of the anthemic "Pigs In Zen." All that would've been fine if the song had been any good, but it's not. In fact it comes across as nothing more than an embarrassingly uncreative top-40ish pop-metal pseudo-funky rip-off of David Navarro's absolutely astounding guitar style and Perry Farrell's brilliant lyrical antics. Only it's not even a well done rip-off.

"Sure," you might say, "but it's the hit single, it's supposed to be the worst song on the album!" Right? Well unfortunately, "Corny Style Pizza" is pretty much the best thing on the whole record.

REVIEW

The rest of the nine songs follow in "Pizza's" style-copying mode. In fact the whole album sounds like Red Hot Chili Peppers meets Fishbone (which you're probably thinking sounds pretty amazing, but alas, Heads Up just can't pull it off.)

The main problem with this band is that they're just too slick, and too studio polished. They're the kind of band that would probably be a blast live, but just loses any of their spark on tape thanks to (ex-Blue Oyster Culter) Albert Bouchard's glossy producing.

Another big problem with Heads Up is the fact that they have a real knack for lyrics which are downright stupid.

"Yo baby, I ain't sad silly or pathetic. I just get all wound up and give myself a headache. Yo cookie, why's it so hard/ When it comes to you I'm just lost in a fog. So why don't you come over here and give this shy little boy/ some of your lovin' stuff/ you know you're my little miss superstar"

Even Morrissey would have a tough time making that sound sincere. But apparently Heads Up really mean it. And as if to prove that they really are as earnest as any other "socially conscious" band, the New York-based foursome indulges us with yet another song about how we're all destroying the planet. This is actually an all right tune up to the point when the earth is referred to as our "Big Mama" and the song just becomes goofy through its own seriousness.

Overall, it's a flat album that leaves nothing memorable even after many listenings. There's definitely talent here, they just need to loosen up. They'd probably be great if you saw them in some packed, sweaty little club, but none of that potential energy ever comes out on Soul Brother Crisis Intervention. So you'll probably want to pass on this one, but if Heads Up ever releases a live album — watch out!

Campus crime rising

Report says more violent acts related to drugs

BOSTON (AP) — Campus crime is up, even though gains have been made in fighting alcohol and drug abuse at universities, participants at a conference said.

The Wednesday conference on drug and alcohol abuse on campus, sponsored by the Massachusetts Bar Association, drew about 100 college administrators, doctors, counselors and lawyers.

And while participants agreed student attitudes about drug use, had changed for the better over the past 10 years, they said drug related violence once ignored by colleges has become more pressing.

A survey done at Towson State University in Maryland showed campus violence was much more common than previously thought. The 1989 survey of 2,000 undergraduates found that more than 36 percent of respondents reported having been the victim of a campus crime.

The survey also found that students who said they had committed a campus crime reported heavier drug use than other students, said Charles E. Maloy, a vice president of student services and counseling director at Towson State.

Boston attorney Jeffery A. Newman, who has represented victims of campus violence around the country, said college administrators had been slow to respond to the increase in campus violence.

"College administrators are just now recognizing that the problem exists," Newman said. "They have always seen themselves just as just educators, but they can't ignore this anymore."

Newman said costly lawsuits have forced colleges and universities to sit up and take notice of campus crime.

"We are seeing more and more cases being filed against colleges," Newman said. "We have an increase in campus crime and with that will come more suits."

Maloy said colleges started taking campus violence seriously after a Lehigh University student was raped and murdered in her dorm room in 1986 by an intruder from another dorm who gained entry through a faculty door lock.

Bush: raise income tax

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush will accept higher income tax rates on the wealthiest Americans in exchange for a deep cut in capital gains taxes, Republican lawmakers said yesterday.

Bush's decision ended two days of confusion over his position on taxes and was designed to address one of the most contentious issues blocking agreement on a $500 billion package of spending cuts and tax increases to get the deficit under control.

Rep. Bill Archer of Texas, a senior Republican on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, emerged from a White House meeting to discuss the plan to say the president was ready to present it later in the day.

Archer said Bush will support raising the marginal tax rate on the wealthiest Americans from 28 percent to 31 percent, but only if Congress lowers the capital gains rate to 15 percent. Capital gains — profits from the sale of stocks, real estate and other assets — are currently taxed at the same rate as other income.

Archer said roughly 500,000 people will get a rate increase under the proposal. "Those will be at the very highest income levels," he said.

Archer said about 4.5 million people would get a rate reduction under the proposal — presumably those now paying a 33 percent rate.

The plan would bring a relatively modest $6 billion in increased tax revenues to the Treasury over five years, Archer said.

Bush's plan seemed designed to facilitate an overall budget accord needed by Oct. 19 to keep the government operating. Even so, it faced an uncertain reception from Senate Republicans, many of whom oppose any increase in income tax rates, even to gain a cut in capital gains taxes.

Participants at the morning meeting said in the new proposal would, in essence, do away with the current 33 percent top rate — now paid by upper middle-class taxpayers.

In essence, GOP lawmakers said, Bush's proposal would flatten out the so-called "bubble" in the tax code, the anomaly under which tax rates on additional income are now lower for the wealthiest Americans than they are for some who are less wealthy.

Instead, there would be three distinct tax brackets. The 15 percent bracket for lower-income Americans would remain. Then, above a certain income level, the taxes for additional income would jump to 28 percent, and finally, move to 31 percent.

Support for EWC strengthened

An open letter to Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson:

As representatives of graduate and undergraduate students, and as concerned women of this community, we find it necessary to reaffirm our commitment to maintaining quality services for women provided by the Everywoman's Center.

The hundreds of women and men who have turned out to support the EWC have only served to strengthen this commitment, proving the unshakable will of women on this campus to fight for our priorities.

We urge you to avoid further action against these unfair cuts by recognizing the needs of women, listening to the voices of tuition-paying students and supporting the aim of the Student Affairs Division, to protect the "health, safety and welfare of students."

Our demands remain as follows: 1) Restoration of the two positions recently transferred out of the EWC, 2) The option for student representatives to offer input into all decisions made about further as well as present and most recent budget cuts, and 3) Statement from your office confirming a commitment to the future existence of the EWC.

GRE preparation smothers

Stacey Farbman

I am sitting on my full size bed with my books sprawled across my lap. Through the open window I see a haze of gray across the sky.

Without even walking outside I know what the weather is: damp and cold with that ever-so-present chance of rain. My teeth are chattering even though I am wearing my winter jacket in my own home.

If you are wondering why, it is because instead of filling up our oil tank, my roommates opted for an after-hours party. Oh, the pleasures of living off campus, such as the electric bill, the cable bill, the water bill . . .

But, hey, at last I can escape it all at any time I want and hang out with my boyfriend. I just go over to his place on North Pleasant Street for a few hours at a time. Lately, I think I've been there too much because he's really started to annoy me.

I'm never with my friends anymore because he really gets jealous and demands my undivided attention. I'm even having a hard time with classes because I never get a chance to study for them.

He says, "Don't worry, you'll get an extension." Yeah, right. I was thinking about dating other guys, but he says I'd get distracted and ignore him. I don't know. I just feel suffocated.

Sometimes it gets to the point where I'd rather be doing anything but be with him. Yeah, I know. There's a limited number of nice guys at this school and I know that I should be happy that I found someone but . . .

OK, so being with him gives me a chance to do something besides go to Delano's for the third night in a row, not to sit around watching soap operas and not to make any long distance phone calls. But, whatever. Enough is enough; I need my space.

There are times I'd rather be sitting in my freezing cold house, eating tuna for the 10th night in a row, because there's no way I have a moment to go food shopping.

Well, it's been bothering me a little too much lately so I decided to call the person who always knows best — Mom.

I ask her advice and she says, "Stacey, you'll be fine. Just calm down and relax. At least, give it till next week when you are done with that graduate exam and you'll have much more time to re-evaluate the situation."

Great. That's all I need — more time to think. If I analyze one more aspect of my life, I'll commit myself to an institution. I don't even know why I am taking the GREs. Who wants more school? What would I even major in?

My decision is made. I am breaking up with Stanley. It's fun being single. Plus, I don't think I could ever imagine marrying someone with a name like Stanley Kaplan.

I'm sure many of you know him. He's not very well liked by most people he's come in contact with. Whatever, I'll move on. There's more fish in the sea.

Hmmmm. Fish is to sea as what is to what? And, if fish live in the sea, does it mean that all fish live in water? What can you infer from the main idea? What would weaken the author's argument?

To anyone taking any standardized exam: I feel for you and Good Luck!

Public targets easiest victim: Olson

Ever since Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson alleged that she was harassed by Patriot team members during a post-game interview in the Patriots' locker room, people have been yelling. But not at the football players. At Lisa.

At the Patriots' last game, effigies of Lisa with arrows pointing between the legs were hoisted aloft by Patriots fans, who chanted, "She asked for it."

Team owner Victor Kiam has called her "a classic bitch." Radio talk shows all around the Boston area have been bombarded by callers who demand, "What was she doing in the men's locker room, anyway?" What Lisa was doing was her job.

Yes, there is something wrong with the fact that female reporters are allowed to question male athletes in the place where they shower and change their clothes. For a male reporter to even set foot inside a women's locker room would be unthinkable.

It is the National Football League's policy, not Lisa's, which states that equal access to the locker room must be given to all news reporters, regardless of race, ethnic background or sex.

Although this policy was undoubtedly adopted in the spirit of equality, the NFL should have known that allowing a woman to approach players while they are in their jockstraps creates uncomfortable feelings for both parties.

But Lisa was in that locker room because her employers sent her there, and because the NFL said it was okay. The Patriots and the public have targeted the easiest victim. Nobody seems to see that they are yelling in the wrong direction.

Diversity destroyed due to assaults

This is to express my deep concern and anger over the increasing numbers of assaults on this campus since the beginning of the semester.

A particular concern are those assaults allegedly motivated by anti-gay or anti-lesbian sentiments.

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst takes pride in its continuing effort to create and foster a high degree of diversity among both staff and students.

Our environment is one in which civility between, among and toward each other is of the highest priority. Anything less results in a significant loss for everyone.

I ask the entire campus community to join me in consistently and strongly condemning the behavior of those few for whom the concept of civility means little or nothing.

I also want to make it clear that assaultive (verbal and/or physical) behavior will not be tolerated.

Anyone with information that will help in persecuting individuals involved with recent incidents is sincerely urged to come forward to either the Dean of Students office or the Office of Public Safety.

Testing the U.N. for a proper response

James Rowell

We are entering a critical age of heavy economic interdependence among nations.

True, there has been a long history of trade in colonial records, but many of the participants are now autonomous nations whose trade heavily influences the economic well-being of other nations.

For this reason, it is becoming increasingly critical to have a balanced and stable world economy — and in light of crises such as Kuwait — for the world community to act in a responsible, collective way, as any family would over its economic future. Especially when the mediums of settling these regional disputes involves the possible exchange of nuclear and chemical weapons.

All of these factors point to one reasonable resolution of the Kuwaiti crisis: a joint United Nations settlement of the problem ending in Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait.

The United States is, of course, allocated a major share of responsibility in this settlement, because of the simple fact that it possesses a major share of the world's military and economic power.

But we must question whether the dynamics of this situation should continue to work this way.

For in continuing our gun-toting image, we dissolve the credibility of the United Nations, and focus the world's array of political fears on our power to manipulate other nations.

For this reason, I am strongly in favor of a joint United Nations reaction to Iraqi aggression, preferably by peaceable methods but by force if necessary.

The Iraqis took by military might what was not theirs, and cannot be rewarded with the illicit prize.

I do not speak these words with any pleasure. Sending people off to fight a war they did not start is never a wholesome experience. But the interests of innocent nations must be protected by someone, and preferably by a world in agreement.

So far, the speakers of various nations have denounced in chorus the invasion of Kuwait.

Hopefully, our joint actions in regards to Kuwait will reflect a coordination and conviction that can set a positive precedent for future situations.

I feel that the test of the United Nations is here, and an appropriate response is critical for sending pulses of stability through a world community that has many trials awaiting it in the future.

Articles on CLT one-sided arguments

I'm concerned by the number of one-sided articles written about the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition. It seems to be getting a great deal of misinformed press.

Everyone seems to believe that a vote for question three on Nov. 6 means the death of UMass. It does not say anything about cutting the school's budget. If our budget is cut at UMass it will be because our legislators decided to cut it.

In fact, question three only says that taxes and fees shall be cut back to the 1988 level. This cut will force our legislators to restructure the Massachusetts budget. After the government has cut out all the unnecessary fat, if new or higher taxes are needed, a referendum question can be written to ask the people for money.

CLT is just asking the government to justify its spending.

Just in case no one thought of this, some of the taxes and fees to be reduced include fees to attend UMass.

100 protest at Faculty Senate meeting

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

About 100 students protested at the Faculty Senate meeting yesterday, criticizing the administration's reduction and termination proposals which they claim target human services, community outreach programs and minority faculty.

Students from affected departments said they felt "threatened" from the announcements of the day. Many expressed disbelief that their departments with large enrollments are scheduled for closure or reduction.

"For ethnic minority graduate students, our opportunity to enter and successfully progress through graduate school will be threatened," said Monty Harris, a graduate student in the Staff Development program in the School of Education.

Harris, holding a sign which read "No firings of faculty of color," said the two programs targeted in Staff Development have been "very instrumental in spearheading a climate of diversity" at the University.

The proposal was criticized for slating 67 percent of the African-American Faculty in the School of Education for possible termination.

Risa Silverman, a student in the Community Health Education program, said the University is the only public higher education school in Massachusetts with a Public Health program.

"Why is Community Health being cut completely when we are doing community outreach?" she asked.

Renee Heberle, a spokesperson for the Graduate Employee Organization, the graduate student employee representative on campus, criticized the administration for making proposals for cuts without consulting with union representatives.

"The administration has slated programs that they consider marginal, but are, in fact, central to many people's needs," she said. "The priorities of the administrators are not to keep the University accessible, not focusing on life services, not education and not serving the larger community."

Although nursing has had the only increase in program enrollment at the University this year, it is slated for reduction and expiration of non-tenured faculty, according to Lisa Watroba, a senior nursing major.

"If we're slated for reduction, there will be nothing left," Watroba said. "All of our clinical instructors are untenured and there is an incredible waiting list of people who want to change into the major."

The administration proposed yesterday that the following programs be reduced: Nursing, Resource Economics, Germanic Language and Literatures, Italian, Slavic Languages and Literatures, Plant Pathology, Entomology and in the School of Education, Research and Evaluation, Educational Policy and Administration, and cultural diversity and reform.

The following programs were proposed to be terminated: Professional Preparation in the School of Physical Education, Community Health Education in the School of Public Health, and in the School of Education, the programs of Staff Development, excluding the Social Issues Training Project.

Weld accuses Silber of GOP ideas for proposed term limits

BOSTON (AP)— Republican candidate for governor William Weld accused John Silber of appropriating GOP ideas after the Democratic candidate proposed limiting the state's constitutional officers to two terms.

Silber presented the proposal to the Massachusetts Business roundtable, saying it would fit with his goal of creating a "citizen government."

Last week, Silber suggested a three-term limit for legislators and a six-month legislative session. Under his latest proposal, Silber would seek a constitutional amendment to limit all constitutional offices to eight years of service.

The state's constitutional officers are the governor, lieutenant governor, treasurer, attorney general, secretary of atte and auditor.

"We will have a government by citizens whose primary concerns and primary perspective is that of the citizen," Silber said.

But Weld, who appeared afterwards at the Business Roundtable, said Republicans have long suggested similar limitations.

"He's coming a little late to the party," Weld said.

Silber also criticized the "revolving door" of people who leave state government and then lobby on behalf of various issues. He said anyone who works in his administration would have to sign a pledge to stay away from such lobbying for at least three years.

Silber took a shot at Weld, saying that when the GOP candidate left his job as U.S. attorney, he joined a law firm and defended white-collar criminals.

But Weld said he complied with federal laws that restrict the activities of former government employees once they enter the private sector.

After responding to the barrage of claims by Silber, Weld said he holds "not very much" respect for the Democratic nominee.

Speaking separately to the business leaders, both Silber and Weld proposed various tax breaks in order to encourage business activity and help revive the economy.

Weld suggested repealing a capital gains tax for productive assets held longer than five years. He cited the example of a person whose small business has grown for several years, but then must dispose of some assets in order to put a child through school.

Eliminating the tax on such capital gains would "create incentive for long-term investment in the state," Weld said.

Silber said that as governor, he would ask business to nominate highly qualified employees to hold key positions in government.

German students react to reunification

Students see a different Europe with Germany reunited

By LARS KROIJER
Collegian Correspondent
and The Associated Press

European and especially German students at the University of Massachusetts expect a dramatically changed Continent with a reunified Germany now a reality after decades of political and social separation.

While U.S. citizens will hardly know the difference, the reunification will create a whole new division of power in Europe, said junior Hans Weber.

"For many years it will cost us a lot of money to rebuild the economy in the east," said Weber, who grew up in Hamburg not far from the old border between the two countries.

He said throughout his life this border had been described as "the Iron Curtain," with two different worlds on each side. In just one year, reforms in the East have removed this curtain and people who until recently were known as the enemy are now Weber's fellow citizens.

A lot of people fear a strong united Germany after the terror of the World War II, but according to Weber this is without reason.

"Hitler was only able to gain power because of the general depression in the 30s," he said. "People were poor and the economy was in a terrible state. They were looking for a strong leader."

However, according to Thomas Hass, another German UMass student, it is understandable why other European countries fear a strong united Germany.

"It may be true that the military treat of Germany is gone but with its economic strength it will have a huge influence on the policies of the [European Community]," he said. "In a time of integration among the European states this could have a negative effect. Some small countries will lose influence and might choose to back out of the community."

German President Richard von Weizaecker said in a speech last week that the united Germany wants "to serve world peace in a united Europe." Many disbelievers have translated that statement to mean "a united Europe dominated by German interests."

The leaders of the new nation said in connection with the recent reunification ceremony that victims of the Nazi regime will never be forgotten. Weizsaecker said Germany would not have been separated in the first place if it was not for the Nazis.

Weber said if he chooses to go back to Germany after he graduates he will not see a different country.

"The changes will not take place in West Germany but rather in the east where there are lots of work to be done," he said.

He said he believes that it is possible to improve the living standard of the former East Germans in relatively short time.

"The big cooperations will invest huge amounts of money in the east and I am sure that the differences will be diminished before long," he said.

'Freedom Flight' brings captives to Baghdad

(AP) — A plane carrying about 400 Americans and other foreign captives in Kuwait and Iraq arrived yesterday in Baghdad on a planned flight to freedom in America. Earlier, an Air Force jet crashed in Saudi Arabia, killing both crewmen.

Most of those aboard the Iraqi Airways Boeing 747 had been held in occupied Kuwait and signed up for the first U.S.-chartered evacuation flight from there since Sept.22. They were taken by bus to Basra, Iraq. The State Department in Washington said they then flew on a 50-minute flight to the Iraqi capital.

It was not known when the foreigners would be allowed to leave for Britain and onward to North Carolina. Officials in Washington said it was believed the arrival at the Raleigh-Durham airport would occur yesterday.

As in previous evacuation flights, arrangements called for Westerners on board to be limited to women and children and to Americans of Arab ancestry.

The jet crash Wednesday was the fourth U.S. military air accident since the United States began deploying forces to the Persian Gulf region following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on Aug. 2. Two helicopters also disappeared during a training flight. In all, 24 servicemen have died, and eight are missing.

Meanwhile, the 10-week old crisis brought more bad news for the U.S. economy. Oil prices rose to a record $41.15 a barrel on the New York Exchange before closing at $38.69, tumbling on an erroneous rumor Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had been killed.

On Tuesday, oil closed at $40.40.

Traders said prices were pushed higher in part by the slaying of 19 Palestinians in a crash with police in Jerusalem on Monday, and by Saddam's threat to retaliate against Israel.

On the New York Stock Exchange, the Dow Jones industrial average fell 37.62 points to 2,407.92, its lowest since May 1989.

Saddam said Tuesday that Iraq had added another missile to its arsenal that could be launched "against the targets of evil when the day of reckoning comes."

He made it clear he was referring to Israel and the U.S.-led forces sent to Saudi Arabia after Kuwait was captured. About 170,000 U.S. forces are deployed in Saudi Arabia and on warships in the gulf region.

Saddam has repeatedly tried to link the status of Palestinians in the Israeli-occupied territories with Kuwait, indicating he might withdraw from the emirate if Israel quits Arab lands seized in 1967.

In Washington, families of seven U.S. service personnel in the crisis area; two congressmen — Reps. Jim Moody and Gerald Kleczka. both Wisconsin Democrats — and religious leaders expressed their concern at a news conference about the military deployment in Saudi Arabia.

S.C. questions fetal policy

WASHINGTON (AP) — Three of the Supreme Court's nine justices have given a chilly reception to an employer's "fetal protection" policy that excludes women of childbearing age from some hazardous jobs.

In a case that could affect millions of working women, Justices John Paul Stevens, Sandra Day O'Connor and Antonin Scalia voiced doubts Wednesday about the wisdom and legality of such a policy.

The court is expected to decide by July whether the policy amounts to illegal sex discrimination.

The three justices, along with Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, dominated an hour-long argument session. They posed numerous questions to the two lawyers before them, firing their most biting inquiries at Stanley Jaspan, who represented the Milwaukee-based Johnson Controls Inc.

Stevens seemed dubious when asking Jaspan about the overall risk posed to women working at Johnson Controls' 13 battery-making plants.

When Jaspan argued that exposure to lead, the principal material used in making batteries, "poised the fetus and causes permanent brain damage," Stevens interrupted to ask, "How often does this happen?"

He asked whether "the slightest risk" was enough to render inapplicable federal law, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, banning on-the-job sex bias.

O'Connor and Scalia took issue with Jaspan's interpretation of what legal duty employers face under a 1978 amendment, called the Pregnancy Discrimination Act, to the law.

"You are not coming to grips with the effect of the Pregnancy Discrimination Act," O'Connor told Jaspan.

And Scalia said Jaspan's suggestion that employers may treat pregnant worker differently if fetal health is an issue "is to make a farce" of the 1978 law. "You're making it a ridiculous piece of legislation," Scalia said.

But Jaspan held firm in defending the company's policy. "It would violate common sense . . . to require an employer to damage unborn children," he argued.

Marsha Berzon, the San Francisco lawyer representing the polic's challengers, told the justices, "The net effect of a policy like this is to sanction the re-segregation of the work force."

She said such policies could "render women marginal workers and oust them from the workplace."

One federal judge, calling the case the most important sex-bias dispute in decades, said the estimated number of women affected runs as high as 20 million.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Byron R. White each asked only one question during Wednesday's session.

Three court members — Justices David Souter, Thurgood Marshall and Harry A. Blackmun — did not ask any questions.

The nation's largest manufacturer of car batteries, Johnson Controls adopted its policy in 1982, declaring certain jobs off limits for fertile women.

Those who could not prove they were infertile were transferred to other jobs, although their salaries were not cut. Some of the women were in their 1960s.

Fertile women now hired are ineligible for top-paying jobs with the greatest lead exposure at the company's plants in California, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Kentucky, North Carolina, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Oregon, Texas, Vermont and Wisconsin.

The policy was upheld in lower courts.

Study: men safe from caffeine

BOSTON (AP) — Coffee drinkers, delight. A good cup of joe, or two, or three, won't hurt the heart, Harvard researchers reported yesterday.

In fact, coffee with caffeine, the often-maligned chemical that gives the brew its kick, may turn out to be easier on the heart than the decaffeinated variety.

"It's amazing how coffee has a bad name, when the harder one looks at health hazards, the more difficult it is to find adverse effects," says Dr. Walter Willett of the Harvard School of Public Health.

His research, part of a huge study of healthy people, shows that those who drink several cups of ordinary caffeinated coffee every day do not raise their risk of heart attacks.

"This is a very reassuring study for something that people enjoy day in and day out," said Dr. Harvey Wolinsky of Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York, an adviser to the National Coffee Association.

The research was based on a survey of the coffee-drinking habits of 45,589 men. It was published in yesterday's New England Journal of Medicine.

Those who suspected coffee was bad for the heart usually assumed caffeine was to blame. But the new research suggests just the opposite: Those who drink more than four cups of decaf a day have about 60 percent higher risk of heart disease than do those who never drink it.

The researchers cautioned that the link between decaf and heart trouble is statistically weak and it is too soon to conclude decaf is harmful.

"There is no particular reason to switch from caffeinated to decaffeinated coffee from the point of view of preventing heart disease," he said.

Local Democrat prepared to defeat incumbent

Robert Cook

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The Democratic candidate for state representative in the First Franklin District, said he is prepared to break the political hold that Republicans have maintained in this district for more than 20 years.

Democrat Robert Cook said he has assessed the district to be voting at least 60 percent Democratic in the past few years, although Republican incumbent Jay Healy has been in office some 20 years.

"Jay Healy does not represent the district any longer," Cook said. "He is a personally wealthy individual with a radical Republican viewpoint who wants to get rid of government services."

In a time when some state voters consider "Democrat" to be a dirty word, Cook said he is proud to be a Democrat and foresees that Democrats will prevail this election.

"The Democratic ideology is that we can work together to use the government to meet needs we can't take care of ourselves," Cook said.

Cook said his platforms are protecting the rights of working people and opposing the Citizens for Limited Taxation tax rollback petition.

The CLT petition will appear on question number three on the November ballot. The petition calls for a reduction of state taxes and fees to 1988 levels. The petition has sparked controversy over whether it will curb government spending, as proponents claim. Opponents have said it will severely cripple all state agencies funded by discretionary accounts.

"The fiscal problems caused by question three are fed through certain tax policies which have led to a reduction of real wages for most people in the last ten years while the wealthiest 10 percent have increased their income by 20 percent," said Cook.

He said the petition's cuts would impact the young, the elderly, students and the average person disproportionately.

This University would, if CLT passes, have to terminate 1,900 jobs and reduce student enrollment by 40 percent, he estimated. Greenfield Community Colleges state appropriation would also be reduced by 38 percent, he noted.

> "These are our schools our children can depend on."
> – Robert Cook

"These are our schools our children depend on," Cook said. "The cuts would destroy this educational opportunity and have a devastating impact on our regional economy."

Cook teaches one course, Continuing Issues and Labor Relations for the Labor Center at the University of Massachusetts this semester. He has also been the chairman of the Worthington Planning Board for 14 years.

The district includes Ashfield, Buckland, Charlemont, Chesterfield, Colrain, Conway, Cummington, Deerfield, Goshen, Heath, Huntington, Middlefield, Plainfield, Shelburne, Sunderland, Whately, Williamsburg and Worthington.

HELP phones are useful

By ERICK OLSEN
Collegian Correspondent

Although the new emergency phone system installed last summer has encountered some problems, the positive aspect has outweighed many of the problems, a campus administrator said.

The HELP emergency telephone system on campus, installed in August, allows students to call friends, the University Escort Service or the University police.

According to Mary Dumas, assistant director of Public Safety, the new system sends a message that "this is a place where people care what happens to someone else."

Dumas said the telephones are used much more often now that their application has been expanded. In addition to their original purpose of emergency police help, students can now call friends anywhere on campus, or call for an escort from any of the 61 HELP telephone locations.

In a random telephone poll, 63 percent of students said they had used the phones often and found them very useful, 30 percent said they had not yet used them but felt they would be very useful, and 7 percent said they were not useful.

Carol Radzick of the Escort Service said students should remember of the existence of help phones in remote parking lots, where simultaneous pick-ups will be arranged to shorten the time between escorts.

Radzick said there has been a tremendous increase in Escort Service usage, from 406 pickups in September 1989 to 1,745 in September 1990. A new program of volunteer administrators as escort drivers will be introduced within the next couple of weeks, she added.

Dumas said there has been a wish-list of possible new locations for emergency HELP phones for several years. The list will be reviewed periodically and more phones will be added.

According to Dumas, five new phones will be "phased in" in the near future, near the Robsham Visitors' Center, by the south end of the Student Union, near the Draper Annex, at the bus shelter by the Fine Arts Center, and on the walkway between Thatcher Residential Hall and Orchard Hill.

Provost Richard O'Brien

20 years at the University he feels "betrayed."

"I can't understand the criteria used, there must be hidden criteria," he said. "We serve a large student body and our program has brought in some $3.6 million in grants in a five-year period. I can't really see it as a money saving proposal."

The administration's proposals must be submitted to the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the campus union representing faculty and librarians, and Faculty Senate for review. In the next 180 days, following extensive scrutiny and review, the Faculty Senate will issue its advice to the administration.

Administrators began a program of cost control last spring in anticipation of state budgetary problems. A freeze was placed on faculty recruitment — a policy still in effect — at a savings of $3 million. Another $3 million was saved through a variety of cost containment programs.

The additional and more immediate problem for administrators is the remaining $10.6 million which has yet to be cut from this year's budget, according to Duffey.

Duffey said to deal with this amount a three point proposal must be taken for consideration.

- A student fee increase of unspecified amount for the Spring 1991 semester. Duffey said that he will try to raise more money for financial aid for that semester only. He added that he has already asked the Board of Trustees for $600,000 raise in a sholarship fund.
- A further cut in all aspects of programs at the University, including base funding for the present as well as the next fiscal year.
- A furlough plan where employees would be "laid off" for several days or weeks.

Duffey said that the three elements above "hang on one another," and that there would be difficulty in bringing them into effect simulteneously.

Duffey said if a plan is not adopted, a mid-year mass termination of employees at all levels of the University might be necessary. He said the longer a conclusion is delayed the more painful cuts must be in order to make up for the $10.6 million shortfall.

If massive layoffs become a reality, resulting in a severe shortage of course offerings, graduation requirements may have to be reassesed, Duffey said. The Faculty Senate will be called to complete this task.

The administration also announced that a transitional task force will be set up to help both students and faculty who are affected by the terminations.

Collegian staff member Preston P. Forman contributed to this report.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Give creative ideas top priority. Your agile mind will get at the root of a problem. Touch base with influential people. Seek information at museums and libraries. Return telephone calls promptly.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Your career is finally on the move! Take time to deal with any obstacles that could stand in your way. Do not be afraid to air your grievances with family members. Reconciliations are likely.

LEO (July 23-August 22) If your physical resources are down, watch what you eat and get more rest. Listen to the advice of partners. Postpone finalizing agreements. Curb a tendency to offer unsolicited suggestions. A Libra is looking out for you.

VIRGO (August 23-September 22) Domestic or family matters could crop up suddenly, changing your plans. Do not take sides on controversial issue just yet. Think things out. Lost articles surface in mysterious places.

LIBRA (September 23-October 22) The spotlight is on the details of your program for the next few weeks. Seek professional assistance when needed. Express your ideas to people who count, and enlist a helping hand or two. A Leo thinks you're nifty.

SCORPIO (October 23-November 21) Discretion and caution may sound dull, but they spell the difference between disappointment and accomplishment. Your social life and romantic life are more stimulating than in recent days.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22-December 21) Word of mouth spreads rapidly and should be favorable. Private issues should remain so. Avoid stirring up trouble; keep your opinions on sensitive topics to yourself.

CAPRICORN (December 22-January 19) Your sense of purpose and powers of persuasion are remarkable today — no need to overplay them. Important agreements can be reached. A trusted adviser steers you in the right direction.

AQUARIUS (January 20-February 18) Home and family affairs get the lion's share of your attention today and tomorrow. Do not overspend on entertainment or luxury gadgets. Get in touch with family members who are on your mind.

PISCES (February 19-March 20) A realignment of domestic routines is indicated this weekend. Positive neighborhood developments could bring elevated community status. Work harder to reach an understanding with teen-agers.

Soccer teams face double dose of action this weekend

● Men to battle A-10 rivals

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

This weekend the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team can leave behind some of the demons that have been plaguing it.

It no longer matters that UMass is currently 2-7-2, or that the Minutemen haven't won in eight tries, or that the offense has been sputtering all season.

All of that goes out the window when one considers this:

If the Minutemen defeat both West Virginia and George Washington on the road this weekend, they will be in fourth place in the Atlantic 10 will have a shot at making the A-10 tournament with two league matches left.

The big word here is if. For UMass to defeat WVU on Friday in Morgantown, W.Va., and/or beat GWU Sunday in Washington DC, they'll have to play their best soccer of the year. Coach Jeff Gettler said Wednesday "our players have to raise their level if we're going to win this weekend."

West Virginia coach John McGrath has not been happy with his team's play as of late. The Mountaineers, 7-3-1 and 1-1-1 in A-10 play, "are not scoring as much as I'd like," said McGrath. He is, however, happy with goalkeeper Dmitri Hassos, who played well in a recent 1-0 loss to Navy.

McGrath called his midfield the Mountaineers' strongest asset, and singled out John Keating as one of his best players. Keating, a junior, is sixth in A-10 scoring with five points. Other strong players for WVU include forward Jason Stiener (3 goals, 4 assists, 10 points) and midfielder Paul Marco (5-2-12).

UMass coach Gettler likened WVU's style of play to Northeastern's. "Like Northeastern, they play on artificial turf. They play hectic soccer; a lot of pressure on the ball, a lot of kick-and-run style play," said Gettler. "Unfortunately, this plays to our weaknesses. They play a lot faster than we'd like."

Gettler also noted that UMass can't be too concerned with WVU's style. "It will be an ugly game, I'm afraid," said Gettler. "But we can't worry about it. We need a win."

On Sunday, the Minutemen face fourth-place George Washington. The Colonials, 5-4-4 overall and 1-0-2 in the A-10, are coming off a huge week in which they shut down Penn State on Monday, tying the Nittany Lions 0-0, and on Wednesday beat Maryland 1-0.

Colonials Sports Information Director Bob Ludwig said that GWU's defense was the teams strong point as of late. Against Penn State, the defense was so strong that goalie Chris Yorke only had to make one save against what was then the top team in the conference.

Monday's tie was an emotional lift as well: GWU has never beaten Penn St., going 0-10-2 against them since 1968.

GWU's strongest player is Junior All-American forward Mario Lone (5-0-10). Other strengths are at midfield, where the Colonials boast both Atlantic 10 co-Freshmen-of-the-year from 1989, Renzo Massa and Chris Masjewski.

UMass may have a better shot at GWU, since the Colonials, like the Minutemen, have had problems scoring. For all of their well-regarded offensive prowess, GWU has only 12 goals off 222 shots. For comparison, UMass has 12 goals in 159 shots.

"We match up well with GWU," said Gettler. "We played well against them in our tournament last year, and gave the game away in the last couple minutes. So we have a chance."

The Minutemen will be without Todd Kylish on Friday due to the NCAA's five yellow card-one game suspension rule. Matt Edgerly will replace him in the line-up. John Gruber will start in goal against WVU, while Steve Armenti will face GWU.

● Regional foes await women

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

This weekend will pose a challenge to the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team. Both of their opponents have track records of success, and solid ones at that.

Head coach Jim Rudy has all the confidence in the world that his squad will step up to meet the challenges of Hartford and Brown in this weekend's play.

"We've had the best week of practice yet," he said. "Our shooting and passing have been good.

"We're too good to keep losing. We've been a bit unlucky."

The Reds' first opponent this weekend is Hartford, Saturday at noon on Upper Boyden. The Hawks are 6-5-1 after Wednesday's 7-0 shutdown against Rhode Island. That score reflects their dominance but the polls reflect their worth: The Hawks are ranked second in New England and No. 12 in the country.

"They're very similar to us," said Rudy. "The games they've lost have been to good teams."

The Hawks only tie was a one-all decision at Boston College. They have gone into overtime with success against New Hampshire (2-0) and Yale (2-1). Other wins have included Stony Brook (3-0), George Mason (5-0) and Southern Methodist (3-2). All but two of their losses have been shutouts: Cal. Berkeley (2-1), Wisc. Madison (2-0), N.C. State (3-0), William and Mary (2-0) and Colorado College (1-2).

"Their people up front scrap well, run well," said Rudy. "They're a very mobile group."

Up front (and scoring) for Hartford are Kim LaMere with nine goals and one assist, and Michelle Thornsbury, with four goals and six assists. Regina Ronan (5-3) and Donna Hornish (3-2) are also significant contributors to the net.

Rudy cited the Hawks' passing skill and outside shooting.

"Their midfield has a lot of depth and ability," he said. "Ronan is good in the air."

He said their goalie Karen Romero is a very difficult opponent. She has started every game this season and has four shutouts behind her. Romero boasts a saves percentage of .817 with 67 saves and 15 goals against in 11 games.

"She's the final ingredient," Rudy said. "She's very acrobatic, a good keeper."

Rudy also pointed out the differences between the two teams, "We play more possessive. We play a shorter game."

Yesterday at practice Rudy said he and the Reds were not yet thinking about the Brown game, to be played Sunday at 2 p.m. in Providence, R.I., but he had obviously thought about strategy at least.

Collegian file photo

Kim Eynard and Jim Rudy's Reds host the Hartford Hawks at noon Saturday on the Hill, then travel to Providence where they will face Brown at 2 p.m. Sunday.

"They're dangerous," Rudy said. "They don't have to dominate a game to win. They find ways to win."

Topping the New England poll, Brown ranks No. 10 in the nation with a 7-1-0 record. Their only loss was a 3-0 shutout against North Carolina.

Four of their victories have been shutouts and their first overtime decision was played Wednesday against Providence College (3-2).

Jennifer Drake is the Bruins' highest scorer with three goals and eight assists.

Rugby chasing leaders, hosts UVM

By DAVE SZPILA
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts rugby club, coming off a 19-4 loss to Dartmouth last weekend, will attempt to redeem itself Saturday against the 0-3 University of Vermont. The game this weekend is crucial for the club to win; UMass is looking to tie up its record in the division and make a run at leaders Williams, Dartmouth, and Norwich.

Game time is at 12:30 p.m. Saturday afternoon on lower Boyden field, behind Southwest.

The team will be without its head coach this weekend, as Doc Laurence is away on business.

This week's matchup looks good for UMass, which has been training all week long under captain Bob Carney. Last year's match at UVM, a 10-6 win for UMass, was close, and the team wants to win again this year without any fists. Violence broke out last year when a fan from UVM spit on a UMass player on a throw in, and a punch and an ambulance followed.

Things to key on this week for the team will be the quickness of the UVM backs, known for their ability to make precise passes in key situations. The forward line is strong and has fairly good speed. A solid defensive front by UMass could could be the difference when the game is over.

The UMass B and C sides will be in action this weekend as well. The teams have been practicing all week on their running game and their passes are getting more precise.

Polo in Eastern tourney

BY JOE DEGLORIA
Collegian Correspondent

It has been two weeks since the University of Massachusetts water polo team last played, when they suffered a disappointing loss to Iona in New York that coach Russ Yarworth said he considered unwarranted and unacceptable.

With the time off to re-work the team, Yarworth said he hopes to make amends at the Eastern Varsity Weekend Tournament at Brown University, this Saturday and Sunday.

Playing this weekend will be the best from the East in the sport of water polo. The No. 19 ranked UMass team will be joined at Brown's Smith Swim Center by No. 12 Brown, No. 17 Harvard, No. 16 Slippery Rock, No. 15 Iona, and No. 13 ranked Navy.

UMass' first opponent will be the 17th ranked Harvard team, and is the first time these two teams have met in the 1990 season. Last year UMass played the Crimson well (a 2-1 record overall).

UMass has had trouble, and carries a 1-4 record, against top twenty teams this season. Two of those four losses were to UCLA and Cal Berkeley, the top two teams in the nation.

"We are going to try to break out of a semi-slump. I have been working them real hard in practice and I am pleased with the team's progress," Yarworth said.

"We are a more focused team than before, we have our backs against the wall somewhat and we know that we have to concentrate to get back on track."

If UMass gets by Harvard it will then play the winner of the Brown-Richmond game. Other first round action will have Navy vs. Washington & Lee, and Slippery Rock facing Iona.

UMass goes into this weekend's play still without high scoring Dan McCosker, and Yarworth is calling on someone to make up for the loss of his offense. McCosker will be out for at least two more weeks.

Brown University defeated Navy to win the season's first Varsity Weekend Tournament in September, 10-9. UMass finished fifth, beating Queens, Princeton, and Iona and losing to Slippery Rock.

Volleyball rams into URI

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

When the UMass women's volleyball team faces the Rhode Island Rams tonight, it will be the David vs. Goliath match of the Atlantic 10 conference.

Goliath is, of course, Rhode Island.

Winners in eight of their last nine matches, the Rams carry an impressive 10-5 overall record (4-0 in the A-10) into tonight's match, which is at URI.

The David of the match is the Minutewomen.

At 3-15 overall and 0-4 in the A-10, UMass has a slightly less impressive record than URI.

The fact that the match is being held at Rhode Island, where coach Carol Ford said, it's always tough to play and there are no breaks, does not make matters better for the Minutewomen.

"We're expecting a tough match all around," said Ford. Despite what seems to be insurmountable odds against her team, Ford said everybody's spirits are up.

After a big win on Sunday over Holy Cross and a good week of practices, Ford said the team was really looking forward to this match.

The status of setter Angie Paolucci is still uncertain, but Ford said setter Cathy Smith is playing real well and the position is secure.

Three key people for the Minutewomen tonight, according to Ford, are captain Nancy Sullivan and middle blockers Sharon Panoff and Rachel Bredemeier.

"They have to have a good match," said Ford, who emphasized their importance blocking and attacking.

This task will be even more difficult than usual because of the quality of the competition on the other side of the net.

Rhode Island showcases two very talented players, junior Kengy Gardiner, who leads the Atlantic-10 in kills/game (4.58) and aces/game (.920), and teammate Nergis Agi, who is in the top four of hitting efficiency (.392) and blocks/game (.950).

Another URI notable is senior Cristy Sandefur, who averages 10.36 assists a game, second in the A-10.

"It only gets tougher," Ford said, referring to tonight's match and the rest of the season.

has accumulated nine shutouts in the team's 13 games. Stacy Gaudette, who starts in net today, has a 0.80 goals against average, and Gina Gioffre has not allowed a goal in the three games which she has played in.

"We hope that we get a few chances to score, we're gonna play our normal game, and hope for the best," said UNH coach Lauren Fuchs.

Penn State is paced by the talented Chelle Frates (nine goals and 12 assists), along with the Player-of-the-Week in the A-10 Kristen Winters (16 goals, four assists). Eleanor Stone compliments the senior duet nicely. Stone has 14 goals and three assists.

Michele Brennan has sparkled in goal, the junior has a 0.50 GAA, and eight shutouts.

PSU is a strong defensive team; they have allowed only 37 penalty corners thus far, while attempting 140. Like ODU, Penn State has very few flaws. They pass well, shoot hard, and are aggressive.

UMass needs a strong game from it's mid-fielders, Sherlan Cabralis, and Beth Thornton. Cabralis was invisible against ODU, but has rebounded since. Thornton and Cabralis seem to be the players that make UMass click.

It would be nice to see the penalty corner crew bounce back. Against a team like PSU, UMass may have only a few offensive opportunities, and it's going to be important to capitalize on one or two corners.

Penn State coach Charlene Morett-Newman was out of the office all day and won't be back until Tuesday. UNH coach Lauren Fuchs was in and out all day practicing and watching tapes of UMass, and Pam Hixon was out most of the afternoon practicing and preparing for what is her team's biggest weekend of the year to date.

who sat out last season because of NCAA Proposition 42, and guard Chris Robinson, who was a late recruit to UMass out of LaSalle Academy in Manhattan, N.Y.

Returnees from last year's team include first team All-Atlantic 10 selection Jim McCoy, A-10 All-Freshman team members Barbee and Harper Williams, Herndon, Rafer Giles, Tommy Pace, John Tate, Anton Brown, Matt Anderson, and Ben Grodsky.

"I'm ready to get started," said Calipari. "It's going to be an exciting night."

"It's important that the [players] understand that people care on this campus . . . it makes you work harder when you know that the people you're playing for care."

Minutemen gun for Huskies in Yankee Conference duel

The Minutemen host the Connecticut Huskies at 1:30 p.m. at McGuirk Alumni Stadium in this weekend's homecoming game. The Minutemen (3-0-1) have won three straight and are chasing New Hampshire (4-0-1) in the Yankee Conference.

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Alumni returning to campus this homecoming weekend, amid the crush of budget cuts and bad vibes, can take heart in the performance of the University of Massachusetts football team.

Saturday's game with Connecticut (McGuirk Alumni Stadium, 1:30 p.m.) finds the Minutemen at 3-0-1 overall and 3-0 in the Yankee Conference and trailing only conference leader New Hampshire, which is 4-0.

Since tying Holy Cross 10-10 in their opening game, the Minutemen have found three different ways to beat three different teams.

Against Maine, the Minutemen stifled Carl Smith and a "smash-face" running game, 21-10. In the third game of the season, Boston University's run-and-shoot ran aground against Allen and Vaughn Williams, Matt Rajotte, Don Caparotti, and Pat Doran in the secondary, while quarterback Gary Wilkos passed for 198 yards and UMass rang up nearly 600 yards total offense.

And last week at Rhode Island, a last minute field goal by Marco Gabrielli lifted UMass past the Rams 16-13 on an afternoon in which UMass was penalized nine times for 70 yards.

The UMass defense gave up 182 yards rushing, but shut the Rams out of the end zone in the fourth quarter, when it counted most. Opponents had averaged less than 100 yards rushing against UMass previously.

"Neither team really dominated offensively," said UMass coach Jim Reid. "I hope that was an excellent football team we played Saturday, because it was a standstill. If they're not very good, that means we're not very good. I've got a feeling we'll find out a lot more about our football team this Saturday."

UConn, 3-2 overall and 1-1 in the Yankee Conference, has won two straight after opening the season with a horrific three game losing streak.

Senior quarterback Matt DeGennaro, who entered the year within striking distance of the all-time Yankee Conference record for passing yards, injured his ribs and shoulder in the second game of the season, a 48-21 drubbing at Div. 1 North Carolina.

Junior Cornelius Benton has filled in since, and played DeGennaro — who is now healthy and ready to return — out of the starting job. Benton turned in a 31-44, 299 yard, one-touchdown performance in last week's 24-22 win over Villanova, and was named Yankee Conference Offensive Player-of-the-Week for the second consecutive week.

Benton will start Saturday, with DeGennaro listed as backup.

With Benton at quarterback UConn "hasn't lost a step," said Reid. "Their offensive flow has been tremendous and Benton is doing some great things. He's fast and he's throwing the ball with great accuracy."

Tailback Kevin Wesley, who emerged from the third slot on the depth chart in last year's wild 39-33 UConn win to rush for 272 yards on 31 carries, is out with a twisted knee.

Game notes: The game will be broadcast on WSPR 1270 AM and WTTT 1430 AM . . . the UMass injury list is "shockingly" short, in Reid's words, considering this is the fifth game of the season. Beside tailback Jerome Bledsoe, who went down against Holy Cross with a broken ankle and is out for the season, the Minutemen are in perfect health . . . Reid is 0-4 vs. the Huskies as a head coach.

Field hockey faces UNH

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

If Pam Hixon and company want to play in the NCAA tournament, they better start winning games against top 20 teams to substantiate their national ranking of 11.

What better way to get out of the gate then by beating the No. 14 ranked team today, and the No. 2 ranked team Sunday?

Today at Totman Field (3 p.m.), UMass entertains the Wildcats from the University of New Hampshire. UNH, 8-2-3, is coming off of a 2-0 victory against Harvard.

Sunday at Totman (1 p.m.), No. 2 ranked Penn State comes to town in a critical Atlantic 10 match. Penn State is 2-0 in the A-10, tops in the conference, while UMass is 2-1. The Minutewomen cannot afford another loss in conference play if they expect to win the A-10.

The Lady Lions are the hottest team in the country. They have won nine straight games and if they beat Bucknell today, and Rhode Island tomorrow (at Totman), they will be facing UMass having won 11 consecutive games.

Looking over the Penn State schedule, UMass is the last top 20 team which the Lady Lions face before the A-10 tournament. If they get out of Amherst with two wins, they should cruise into the A-10 post season without having suffered a loss since they were beaten by Old Dominion 2-1 in the third game of the year.

So, what is UMass facing this weekend?

Two very important games.

The game against UNH is a must-win situation, because a loss will drop the Minutewomen in the rankings, probably to around No. 13 or 14. The top 12 teams make the NCAA tournament, and although it is a little early to start looking toward the post season, UMass does not want to put itself in the position where they must win the A-10 tournament to receive a bid to the big show.

The game with Penn State is another test to see where the Minutewomen stand among the top teams in the nation. The last time UMass faced the No. 2 team in the country they were soundly defeated by Old Dominion (who is now the No. 1 team). Since that loss, things have been downhill; UMass has lost to Northeastern and Temple, while beating a weak St. Joseph's team.

UNH is led by senior forward Liz Brickley's 10 goals. However, Brickley has been unable to carry the team like a Jane Catanzaro (34 goals) of Temple can. UNH has scored only 25 goals this season.

The true strength of UNH is it's goaltending, which

Hoop Madness back in the Cage

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

What if seven players came down with the flu during a University of Massachusetts basketball game and coach John Calipari, desperate for help, turned around to the stands and pointed at you. Hey, are you wearing sneakers?

Ever had this fantasy? Sunday beginning at 10 p.m., students will get their chance to dunk, shoot free throws and play three-on-three in front of a Cage full of fans during Midnight Madness, a two-hour kickoff to the UMass men's basketball season.

Admission to the second-annual open practice at the Cage is free and open to the public. Cage doors will open at 10 p.m.

Fans are encouraged to bring donations of canned food to be collected for the Western Mass Food Bank, said UMass coach John Calipari.

UMass last season won eight games at the Cage and 17 overall, and earned a berth in the postseason National Invitational Tournament.

Gift certificates, sneakers, and two airline tickets to Florida will be raffled away Sunday night to thank the fans for bolstering the program, said Calipari. Free ice cream will be served between 10:30 p.m. and 11:30 p.m.

"It's a way of thanking the students for the support they've given us over the last year and for making the Cage a tough place for opponents to play," he said.

"If we're to win our league this season, we've got to win all our games in the Cage. Last year we were 8-1 [at the Cage] . . . and the students played a big part in that."

The 1990-91 Minutemen will be introduced just after midnight — October 15 is the first day NCAA rules allow for varsity basketball practice — and a dunk contest, "a couple of exhibitions," and a short scrimmage will follow, said Calipari. Midnight Madness is expected to wind down by 12:30 a.m.

Junior William Herndon, a 6-foot-3 forward for the Minutemen, will be defending his dunk contest crown in a race Calipari described as "over."

Said Calipari, "I think Will Herndon will win it. Will usually jumps only as high as he has to."

Herndon could face a challenge from the stands, however, as the dunk contest will be open to students. Students who wish to enter should let the coaching staff know beforehand, Calipari said.

Tony Barbee, who finished second to Herndon in last year's dunk contest, is back for a second try, and 7-foot-2 freshman Jeff Meyer will debut.

Sunday midnight also marks the first appearance in a Minuteman uniform for 6-foot-9 Kennard Robinson.

Public higher ed students picket High Tech Council in Boston

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Almost 70 public higher education students picketed the Massachusetts High Technology Council on Friday to urge the council to denounce tax rollback question three, which is estimated would cut $126 million from state colleges and universities.

Question three is the Citizens for Limited Taxation/High Tech Council petition, a referendum which would rollback state taxes and fees to 1988 levels. The petition's proponents hope it will restructure state government and curb legislative spending.

Students denounced the petition for the estimated 38 percent cut in state allocations that public higher education would face if question three passes. Higher education has already been cut 12 percent since July.

Student Trustee Angus McQuilken, from the University of Massachusetts, asked the High Tech Council to consider the long term impact that cuts in public higher education will have on state businesses and industries. The High Tech Council, which has its headquarters in the World Trade Center, represents high tech industry and businesses in Massachusetts.

"Massachusetts industry and the High Tech Council need a highly trained work force for which public education has been the only outlet for lower and middle class people to achieve," McQuilken said. "Without a trained workforce, Massachusetts will never recover from the recession of the last three years."

Mark Rockwal, the student trustee from Westfield State College, said since the High Tech Council was created in 1977, it has supported public higher education until its recent endorsement of ballot question number three.

"The original goal of HTC was to lobby for public higher education because they wanted skilled and educated employees," Rockwal said. "Their support of question three goes against their original goals. Does the HTC want to fall further behind the Japanese and the Germans?"

Howard Foley, the president of HTC, came from his office to where students were picketing in front of the World Trade Center, inviting McQuilken and Dan Currie from UMass-Boston to his office for discussion.

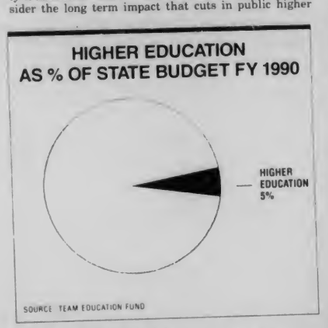
Foley had no official comment about the protest, but told McQuilken and Currie that he has proposed to the businesses and industries represented in HTC to donate 2 percent of their profits in private grants to public higher education and scholarship funds.

McQuilken and Currie criticized Foley's proposal, calling it another means, besides question three, of privatizing public higher education.

The protesters marched from the World Trade Center through downtown Boston to the Boston Commons, escorted by six Boston police officers on motorcycle. They handed spectators leaflets which explained the impact of question three on public higher education.

The picket reconvened on the Commons in front of the Citizens for Limited Taxation headquarters on the corner of Tremont and West Street. The headquarters apparently was closed at the time of the picket and students were denied access to the office.

The leaflets were provided by the Massachusetts Teachers Association, who prearranged the picket with the city of Boston.



Milking cows at UMass Barn an occupation

Editor's note: This is the first of a series of articles examining aspects of employment at the University of Massachusetts.

By MARK HENSLEY
Collegian Correspondent

When people think of Saturday night life at the University of Massachusetts, milking cows doesn't exactly jump to mind.

But milking cows is what UMass junior Chris Albus thinks about every Saturday at 4 a.m.

Right about the time when the last die-hard partyers are stumbling home to bed and the pizza places have just stopped delivering, Albus, dressed in well-worn work boots, fatigue pants, and an old, grey sweatshirt, is herding the first of 82 cows into the automated milking bay at the University Dairy on River Street in South Deerfield.

The dairy, which functions primarily as a learning facility, operates as a full-blown commercial dairy as well. In two days it produces about 1,500 gallons of milk, which is collected by Pioneer Dairy. The milk is then pasteurized, homogenized, and finally sold back to the University for consumption.

Albus, a 24 year-old veterinarian and animal science major, seems not to notice the strong-smelling barn as he goes about cleaning the teats of the first four cows with an iodine and water solution.

Although many may not regard the job as fun, Albus replies simply, "I've done it all my life, it's what I like."

Albus grew up on a 300-cow farm in Brattleboro, Vt., and began milking when he was 14, a fact confirmed by the ease and confidence with which he maneuvers his tall frame around the milling 1,300 pound cattle.

UM pours on UConn, 38-19

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Saturday in tropical-storm soaked McGuirk Alumni Stadium, the University of Connecticut fumbled its way to a 38-19 loss while a sure-footed University of Massachusetts running attack rushed for 316 yards on 64 attempts, an average of almost five yards per carry.

The win raised UMass, now 4-0-1 overall, to a first-place tie atop the Yankee Conference with New Hampshire, at 4-0. UConn, the preseason favorite to win the conference, dropped to 2-4, 1-2.

The playing conditions — there were puddles on the field before the game — bothered UConn's pass-oriented attack more than they slowed UMass, which entered the game with the top-rated rushing game in the Yankee Conference.

While the Huskies spent most of the afternoon rooting around in the mud after loose footballs, the Minutemen marched for five touchdowns, including scoring drives of 89, 70, and 67 yards.

"We kind of shot ourselves in the foot," said UConn coach Tom Jackson of a day when the the Huskies fumbled 10 times, including seven muffed exchanges between quarterbacks Cornelius Benton and Matt DeGennaro, and center Pete Gale. "But I don't know that it mattered. It was their day."

When coach Reid woke up Saturday morning to a

In an effort to elicit feedback from the campus community and beyond, President-Chancellor Duffey has scheduled three information sessions on the University's budget and its effect on the campus.

Duffey made the announcement at last week's Faculty Senate meeting, where it was disclosed that the administration will seek the closure of four programs and the reduction of ten programs.

Duffey will talk about the University's budget status and listen to questions and comments from the audience.

At the Thursday Senate meeting Duffey said that he wants to "learn, listen and test responses" to the plan by meeting with students, faculty, staff, and also parents.

- The first session, for faculty and staff, is scheduled for 4 to 5 p.m. today in Bowker Auditorium
- On Wednesday, Duffey will meet with students from 4 to 5 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union.
- A third meeting in scheduled for parents in a yet-to-be-determined Framingham location on Thursday.

One reason why Albus likes his job is that there are few deadlines.

"Nobody bothers you here; you can do things as fast as you want," he said. "I couldn't even think of working for a newspaper."

Albus said he used to work full time in the summer, but now, with a 22-credit course load, he only works on Saturdays. He said he is presently enrolled in the Reserve Officer Training Corps at the UMass and spent two years as a team leader in the Army in Hawaii. His ultimate goal is to become an Army veterinarian.

Although the hours are unusual, Albus is happy with his job, and said it gives him the opportunity to apply what he learns in class to real life situations.

"I wanted some good experience, so I just came down and applied," he said. "It's a great job, especially if you like working with large animals."

Facility Director Don Baker also recommended the job for students who think they want to work with animals.

"It makes sense to try it out before you really commit to it," he said.

For anyone interested in visiting or working at the dairy, Baker more than welcomes them to come and pay a visit.

Visitors who brave the inevitable odor can take a tour in which they'll see 'Fred,' the dairy's stud bull, the milking pit, the dairy's prized Red Hornstein calf with red markings, and perhaps with a little luck, a newly born calf or two.

Less jobs than expected

BOSTON (AP) — New studies have challenged state estimates that the $5 billion Central Artery Third Harbor Tunnel project will create 15,000 jobs and jump-start the Massachusetts economy.

On Friday, Associated Industries of Massachusetts issued an economic impact report that said the state's labor and materials calculations were overly rosy.

The report estimated the project would yield a maximum of 10,000 jobs.

Data Resources Inc. of Lexington also estimated the project would create no more than 10,000 jobs.

Hillel House formally dedicated in ceremony

Hillel House

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

With the B'nai B'rith dedication of Hillel House on North Pleasant Street this Sunday, nearly 3,600 Jewish students at the University of Massachusetts now have a new home, library and community center to call their own.

In speeches punctuated by the words "duty," "special" and "happy," over 150 students, faculty and administrators gathered for Hanukat Ha Bayit, a dedication ceremony.

The ceremony began at the 400 square-foot former Hillel office at the Student Union, and finished with the fastening of the traditional mezuzzah to the doorpost of the 16,000 square-foot house and community center.

The Hillel House, the former Beta Kappa Phi fraternity house, contains a kosher dining facility, meeting rooms, staff offices and living accomodations for 26 students.

Joel Berkowitz, class of 1963 and a former Hillel president, said the $1.5 million renovation of the house could not have been accomplished without the foresight of President-Chancellor Duffey, the effort of many campus administrators, and the push of Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

He said the true credit of making the house a reality was Harold Grinspoon of Springfield, who placed a $50,000 down payment to buy the house two years ago.

Grinspoon said that although neither he nor anyone in his family has attended UMass, he noticed the void on this campus, and after some prodding by Perlmutter and others decided to help.

"I saw the need for a larger Jewish presence on this campus," he said, after the ceremony. "To not have a Jewish presence on a campus this large is a shame — and to work in a office so small [in the Student Union] is also a shame."

Duffey, one of the main organizers of the Hillel Home effort, joked that he first looked to the Newman Center as a home for Hillel.

"I tried to grab the Newman Center for Hillel but I could not get the cardinal to go along," he said laughing.

Duffy, who attended the dedication with his wife, Anne Wexler, and state Rep. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst), called Hillel House a important step in restoring the sense of family he said is slipping away from Americans.

"As our campus develops, we should use the strength of heritage to build something new, a mosaic, a new civilization," he said. "As we celebrate our diversity, we must remember our unity."

Other state colleges prepare estimates of CLT's impact

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Several state universities and colleges in Massachusetts have estimated the impact of cuts in state funding for their campuses if the tax rollback question is passed by voters in the Nov. 6 election.

After weathering three 4 percent across-the-board cuts since July, many public higher education campuses have already made proposals to reduce programs, terminate non-tenured faculty and impose new student fee increases.

State funding for public higher education has decreased by $169 million in the past three years. The Citizens for Limited Taxation/Massachusetts High Technology Council petition, ballot question number three, would cut an additional $126 million in the middle of this year, according to the Board of Regents of Higher Education.

The petition calls for a state tax and fee rollback to 1988 levels. Backers of the petition want question three to restructure state government to eliminate what they consider to be wasteful spending and needless bureaucracy. The rollback will cut $6.369 billion in the next three years from discretionary monies; 40 percent of discretionary funds will be reduced in the middle of this fiscal year.

Administrators at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst have proposed a reduction or elimination of 14 departments and are discussing a $400-450 student fee increase for next semester due to past budget cuts.

If CLT passes, the administration has projected that tuition will increase by $2,000 per student next semester, and 1,400 state-funded employees, including 520 faculty, will be terminated.

Sean Ahearn, vice president of the Student Government Association, said UMass-Boston said some non-tenured faculty have been terminated and programs such as Public and Community Service, Student Support Services and Health Services have been reduced. He estimated that a $300 student fee increase will be imposed next semester.

The department of Public and Community Service and the School of Nursing will be closed if CLT passes, and there will be a tuition increase of over $1,000, he said.

Bristol Community College has reduced part-time faculty and is presently

Chair of Amherst Select Board comes out

By ALI WOOLWICH
Collegian Staff

Elisa Campbell, co-chair of the Amherst town Select Board and head of documentation at the University Computing Center, recently came out as bisexual.

Her decision to come out was originally spurred by a conference on multiculturalism called by the District Attorney of Hampshire County, for members of local government in February, 1990.

Among the various speakers were members from Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD), who talked about visibility of gay people.

Campbell said she realized, because gay, lesbian and bisexual people are usually not easily recognizeable, how often "people assume they don't know anyone gay, lesbian, or bisexual."

In mid-June 1990, the Amherst Select-Board held a similar multicultural workshop for its members, which was closed to the press. Campbell decided that the workshop was an appropriate place to announce her own sexual orientation.

As the head of the Select-Board, she met with members of the press after the workshop, to inform them of the events of the meeting. The news of her coming out was focused on in articles in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, the Amherst Bulletin, and the Springfield Union News.

"Overall, its been positive...liberating. I'm freer to be myself," said Campbell. Due to the efforts of the gay civil rights movement, "it's easier for people to come out now."

She also noted that she has had no negative reactions, and has not been harassed. In general, she has gotten a lot of congratulations, she said.

Campbell said that she saw Gerry Studds and Barney Frank, who are both Congressional representatives from Massachusetts and both openly gay men, as positive role models for gay, lesbian and bisexual people.

Campbell first entered "public life" twenty years ago, working as an activist in the Sierra Club, a national environmental group.

She is also a former chair of the University of Massachusetts chapter of the University Women's Professional Network. She is currently a member of the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Faculty/Staff Support Group.

Confidence in her self identity, a supportive community, and having the UMass non-discrimination policy enforced in her workplace all contributed to making coming out easy, said Campbell.

Campbell spoke at last week's National Coming Out Day rally, and said that homophobic harassment and heterosexist discrimination are not tolerated in the town of Amherst, and encouraged people to report any incidents. She also talked of the importance of coming out, and how lesbian and bisexual women that she knew had been role models for her, and had helped her to come out.

A University of Massachusetts woman was injured Thursday night when she was allegedly struck by a vehicle operated by an Amherst woman.

Sonia Pons, 18, of MacNamara Residence Hall, was transported from Stockbridge Road to University Health Services by Amherst Fire Department ambulance after the accident.

Police said that Pons was struck as she was crossing the street in the crosswalk by Angela Schilling.

Schilling was cited in the incident, police said.

LARCENY

- A Kennedy Residence Hall man reported to police Wednesday the theft of his wallet and credit cards from his unlocked room. The estimated value is $20.
- A male resident of Prince reported Wednesday the theft of his 1984 Renault from Lot 11. The estimated value of the car is $2000.
- A man reported that his truck parked in Lot 12 was broken into Thursday and a set of golf clubs stolen.
- A member of the janitorial staff in Kennedy reported Thursday the theft of a vacuum cleaner and a cleaning cart with supplies. The estimate value is $900.
- A staff member in Hampden Gallery reported Thursday the theft of training shoes, bicycle shorts and gloves. The estimated value is $205.
- A woman reported that her vehicle parked in Lot 11 was broken into Thursday. She told police that her radar detector, valued at $80, was stolen.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer of cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Issues are not that simple

Political discussion has been confined to the 30-second commercial slot between the Cosby Show and Roseanne. It's thumbs up or thumbs down. Right or wrong. There's no in between.

When society oversimplifies the issues one must question how accurate a picture we are really receiving. For example, take the Oct. 9 killing of 19 to 24 Palestinians by the Israeli army.

Adam Stein

To describe this incident in inflammatory would be doing a disservice to those who are truly interested in understanding what really happened. Such killings cannot easily be referred to as a 'systematic murder,' 'bloodbath,' or 'Zionist rampage' without losing sight of the truth.

A group of Jewish extremists planned, as they do every year, to infringe upon the rights of the Dome of the Rock. However, the Israeli Supreme Court, as is done every year, refused the radicals permission to hold a ceremony at the Muslim holy site. Yet 3,000 of the Palestinian community gathered to vent their anger against Israeli occupation and to protect the sanctity of the Mosques.

Where were the great masses last year when the same group tried to do the same thing? Nowhere, for only 40 showed to protect the third-holiest site of Islam. Then again, at that time, Israel was constantly being criticized on the front pages of the papers, and there was no need to create a fire for which the media would report an inferno.

However, now the inferno is about Saddam Hussein, and it would be politically smart for the Palestinian cause to draw the attention back to Israel.

The political details were probably unknown to the average demonstrator. Shouting political and religious slogans for support, the crowd was getting angrier and angrier. People had brought sticks, bottles and rocks to defend the shrines — and to think that on the other side of the compound wall were 20,000 Jews praying at the remains of the Second Temple! The Palestinians could probably even hear them!

So, in this frame of mind... at this stage of anger... with weapons in hand, is it so impossible to believe that perhaps one (and that's all it would take) decided to throw his/her stone over the wall? And if one did it, would not others soon follow? Perhaps, out of 3,000 people it was only 200, or maybe 300, people threw stones.

The soldiers were ill-prepared to confront such a demonstration. They were but a few dozen, facing a few thousand, who, at this stage of mob mentality, would have wanted to see any Israeli dead. On the soldiers' minds were the Palestinian extremists who have been kidnapping random Israeli civilians and dumping their brutalized bodies. Then there was their comrade who was burnt alive after he took a wrong turn in the Gaza Strip. Would this crowd not do the same to them?

Terrified, they fired tear gas and rubber bullets. When they ran out, journalists, monitoring police scanners heard, "We don't have any rubber [bullets] or gas — send us provisions (New York Times, Oct. 10, 1990)."

Yet the soldiers probably felt they could hold out no loner. By now the entire crowd was engaged in throwing stones at the Jewish pilgrimage and the soldiers feared for their lives. Furthermore, they feared what would happen if the Jewish 20,000 would try to stop the Palestinian 3,000 by themselves. Would this be the beginning of another war?

Too often issues are molded into a black-and-white picture to determine the bad guys from the good guys. Capitalism good, communism bad. Business executive diligent, welfare recipient lazy. Me Tarzan, you Jane.

Yet, where this incident is not cut and dry, neither is any issue. It is not necessarily the armed against the defenseless. It is the fears and violence of some, coming against the fears and violence of others.

To portray otherwise oversimplifies the issue.

'Me good, you bad' changes the focus of the issue, as continuous oversimplification eventually leads to propaganda.

Support for Israel must be reexamined

Israel sure has a funny way of keeping a low profile while the United States is busy playing the Mideast scene in the continuing saga of "Policeman of the World."

While the Persian Gulf crisis has become the biggest powder keg since since Khrushchev and Kennedy decided to play a round of brinksmanship, Israel has decided to light one up.

The deplorable massacre of 19 Palestinians speaks volumes in terms of the human rights policy of the Israeli government. In fact, the practices of the Israeli police seemingly differ little from the methods used in such notorious places as Soweto and El Salvador.

It is not shocking that the Israeli police would open fire on Palestinians armed only with rocks; they have steadily escalated their level of violence. What is astonishing is the disregard for the incredible sensitivity in the region right now.

At a time when it is important that Israel resemble something akin to diplomatic, it has opted to be the answer to all of Saddam Hussein's public relations problems in the Arab world.

If the Bush-Baker braintrust has a worst-case scenario for Operation Desert Shield, the "Israel Kills Largest Number of Arabs Since the Six-Day War" scenario would have been too far-fetched to include.

It is apparent that the Israeli bullets-against-stones theory of law and order has finally gone too far. Now even the most strident pro-Israel voices in the House and Senate need to reexamine our unbounded support of Israel.

Fight against war before it's too late

A needless and bloody war in the Middle East is now highly likely. The White male patriarchs of the cold war generation are maneuvering the United States into a war in the Middle East in order to preserve the U.S. status as the world policeman, to protect the military-industrial complex from being downscaled and to maintain what the president has called "our way of life." This is a euphemism for gas-guzzling cars and the interests of the big oil companies that pollute the environment.

Ferguson/Sheefar

The U.S. military showdown to defend the principles of non-intervention and self-determination doesn't carry much moral weight when we police only those violations of international law that serve certain vested interests in this country. Meanwhile, we ignore Israel's illegal occupation of Arab lands and its brutal treatment of the Palestinian people and, only mildly reprimand gross violations of human rights in El Salvador and Guatemala. We also invade countries such as Grenada and Panama — in principle, quite similar to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

We would benefit from a president with integrity and vision who would cut off spending and divert this money to an array of socially useful programs at home, such as more federal aid to public education. A president who would support the United Nations by giving it real authority to police violations of international law everywhere through funding the U.N. peace-keeping forces rather than sending 200,000 of U.S. troops and materiel to act as a mercenary army to dominate the region.

The United States has put itself in an untenable position in the gulf. Today's asset of a powerful military presence could be tomorrow's liability of a crippled giant if Iraq does not leave Kuwait soon. The perception of eroding U.S. creditably will put increasing pressure on the administration — cornered by its own actions and rhetoric — to resort to military action. On the other hand, economic sanctions take time to make their full impact felt and work. This requires a time frame much longer than the U.S. military strategy allows. To make matters worse, the U.S. government, pressed by the Pentagon and Israeli lobbies, has virtually slammed the door on any compromise, with Iraq insisting on its unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait.

Washington's response to the crisis is a recipe for disaster. As it now stands, it can only lead to a military confrontation the costs of which would be enormous: massive military and civilian casualties, the break up of the international coalition against Iraq, destabilization of participant governments in the region, destruction of the oil fields in the area and the subsequent skyrocketing of oil prices, higher inflation and interest rates, greater budget deficit in the U.S., and dependence on foreign sources of finance. All this would spell disaster for the majority of people in this country save for the vested interests in the military-industrial complex and big oil companies.

War in the Middle East is almost certain unless there is an outcry from the American public. This war won't just involve volunteer armed services be dying — there will be a military draft, and young college men won't be exempt.

Do you want to give your life or see your friends' lives given for the big oil companies, the Pentagon patriarchs and an environmentally destructive way of life? If not, get involved. Protest! Write your Congressmen!

The only way to control your life is to challenge those who rule it. For more information, call the UMass Ad Hoc Coalition on the Middle East. Contact Marsha Brown at 546-3662.

The economy, baseball and budget cuts — one big heartache

When we think of baseball we think of home runs, strike outs and Babe Ruth. When we think of the Red Sox, we think of excitement followed by heartbreak.

This season, the Sox have once again left us disappointed and the curses that have haunt this team lives on.

Joseph M. Montagna

The ugly ending to the season, with Roger Clemens's expulsion of obscenities in front of a national television audience, does leave a bitter memory.

But the success of the Red Sox over the past few months was important to those of us who follow baseball in New England.

Even for those who aren't ardent fans of the national pastime, the team's surprising season, which culminated in a divisional championship that no one thought possible back in April, was a welcome relief or distraction from the difficulties of living in Massachusetts during these troubled times.

As members of this sinking state, most of us have felt the economic crunch. For those of us in college or work in the campus environment, the possible devastating effects of more budget cuts only add to the anxiety of the college experience.

Furthermore, the crisis in the Persian Gulf and the grim possibility of war increase an already negative outlook on the world.

Being human, you have to look for positives somewhere. And for the excited crowds who filed into Fenway Park or for the thousands of listeners or viewers, they found positives in the over-achieving Red Sox.

I can remember during the dog days of August, the team was in the middle of a 10-game winning streak and there was euphoria in the air. The team was a winner.

Win or lose, the Red Sox wouldn't affect our lives, but it could affect our emotions.

I wonder how many of us glanced at the disturbing news of the headline page and skipped to the sports section instead. I know I did.

This is not to say that the Red Sox in 1990 made significant contributions to society. In the first place, they are a private business out to make a profit and their management could be easily criticized.

But for a while, they captured our attention and gave many of us a reason to smile when it wasn't the easiest time to be cheerful.

Yes, it was an up and down roller-coaster ride of a season, but we rode it with them and in the process had fun and eased our minds a little.

So for Red Sox fans who are frustrated and feel victimized by the curse that seems to have been slapped on this team since it traded Babe Ruth, at least things were interesting again.

Someone once said (I'm sorry I can't recall who) that if you have to choose between nothing and grief, take grief.

Well, despite the fact that for as long as anyone can remember baseball fans in New England have been "waiting till next year," the same thinking could apply to the Red Sox.

Or maybe it would at least ease the pain a little until next year.

Three new ways to survive college.

The Macintosh Classic The Macintosh IIC The Macintosh IIsi

With Apple's introduction of three new Macintosh® computers, meeting the challenges of college life just got a whole lot easier. Because now, everybody can afford a Macintosh.

The Macintosh Classic is our most affordable model, yet it comes with everything you need—including a hard disk drive. The Macintosh IIC combines color capabilities with affordability. And the Macintosh IIsi is perfect for students who need a computer with extra power and expandability.

No matter which Macintosh you choose, you'll have a computer that lightens your work load without giving you another tough subject to learn. Every Macintosh computer is easy to set up and even easier to master. And when you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. That's because thousands of available programs all work in the same, consistent manner. You can even share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to Apple's versatile SuperDrive,™ which reads from and writes to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple® II floppy disks.

See the new Macintosh computers for yourself, and find out how surviving college just got a whole lot easier.

ARTS & LIVING

UMass talent bursts forth in Multiband Pops

By MELISA CANLI
Collegian Correspondent

The amount of talent in the Fine Arts Center on Friday was incredible. The 16th Annual Multiband Pops sponsored by the UMass Department of Music and Dance was the best way possible to start Homecoming Weekend.

Approximately 500 students participated in this event which included a vocal choir, varied musical ensembles, dance and the famous Minuteman Marching Band. The performance, which benefited the University Friends of Music Scholarship Fund, was presented to an almost sold-out audience composed of alumni and student fans of UMass' most selective talent.

The fanfare started with Walter Chesnut, the University Herald Trumpeter. The Chapel Jazz Ensemble was the first group to stir the atmosphere with a lively piece. For a few songs, the jazz ensemble combined their music with the Vocal Jazz Choir composed of 15 singers.

"Save Me," by the Afro-American Music Ensemble was one of the most moving songs in the whole show. Director Horace Boyer's deep voice, along with the many clapping hands and gospel lyrics drew an enormous round of applause. The marimbas provided the perfect contrast after the upbeat jazz. Their music was one to which water nymphs could dance.

Next, the wind ensemble performed a Russian piece and then the audience was brought into Africa with the steady beat of percussion instruments. The African essence was projected on the curtain with the image of a huge idol-like wooden face.

The focus after the break was changed to two modern dance pieces under a starry sky backdrop. Prince's "Baby I'm a Star" boomed across the FAC for the UMass baton twirlers, in their red, white and blue glory. The colorguard presented a first-time showing of a piece — separate from what they do with the band at football games.

Following this, it was time for the "power and class" of New England: The Minuteman Marching Band in full uniform. It was a wonder to see all 300 musicians moving in unison on a stage that was barely large enough to hold them. After riling up the audience, the band played a selection from Phantom of the Opera, complete with the mask of the Phantom on both sides of the theater in eerie lilac light.

Then the band became part of the crowd, as they mingled in the aisles and played cheers for the football and basketball teams who were invited to walk on stage and receive applause. The show drew to a close amidst everyone singing the alma mater and giving the talented group a well-deserved standing ovation.

It is difficult to believe that the event was rehearsed only one night as a complete production. Of course all the groups had been at school a week before it started to prepare their individual performances.

George Parks, director of the marching band, commented: "I think this is a great university and this is one of the things that makes it great. We just need to get more people in here to watch. Maybe if more legislators came to watch they would get their acts together."

I left the FAC with music in my ears, pride in my school, and a share of the joy exuding from the accomplishment of my hard-working peers.

Hampden's cozy Beat Cafe: 60s inspired, 90s tailored

By LEAH ARINIELLO
Collegian Correspondent

If you're sick of waiting half-an-hour in line to get into Barsie's or Delano's, you may want to venture to the Beat Cafe, where the only wait you'll find is the five minutes it takes to set up in between the mixture of acts that range from music to prose to comedy.

Right in Southwest's Hampden Theatre, there is a beatnik-inspired coffee house. In a cozy, candlelit room (perfect for a date) people get up on stage and let loose. What Vernon Frazier called, "The alternative culture, none of this top-40 crap."

Thursday night it all began with a UMass art student, Tedric Eiseman. "A Day with you . . ." he sang, while strumming on guitar. Casually he'd look up, fingers running through his hair, eyes wide, ". . . is exactly like cantaloupe." He later went on to sing a lament for a car, dedicated to a freshwater mermaid he met in Martha's Vineyard. "You gotta hole in the gasoline/You gotta rejection sticker/Rust in peace," he swooned.

A little kooky, but aren't you sick of listening to, "Three alligators, some long neck geese, humpy back camels," that a bunch of drunks mime at Time Out every week? You may shock yourself and get into something like the surfy, sinister sounds of Double Who, Garage Jazz musicians made up of David Mintz and Robert Yochim, or the Vernon Frazier Jazz Poetry Band.

REVIEW

The latter sang "Sex Queen of the Berlin Turnpike," a piece the band prides itself on never doing the same way twice. The band used everything from a cello to a xylophone to let loose a stream of musical energy countered by Vernon Frazier's cutting prose. In a cool mellow voice we hear pieces of an exotic dancer's life. "She flashes her tits . . . for tips," is almost drowned in a frantic whirlwind of sound.

To take a break from the music there was also a comedian, Izzy Gessell. He talked about everything from politics to tofu, the Valley's favorite food — a substance he said consisted of "a bullion cube made from Elmer's glue." So forget the 90s bar scene November 7, and try the 60s Beat Cafe: minus the berets, black turtlenecks and the no longer hip act of smoking, but plenty of coffee and wild entertainment.

Hitchcock's eerie twists of word make for a quirky evening

By JOHN PURIN
Collegian Correspondent

Robyn Hitchcock
Iron Horse
Thursday, Oct. 11

It's hard to know what to say about Robyn Hitchcock, the British phenomenon who graced the Iron Horse with a solo acoustic show Thursday night. But if we have to find words to apply to such a mutant pop genius, the word "obscure" certainly springs to mind.

It's difficult to determine if some twisted meaning lies behind his curious collection of lyrics and repertoire of quirky melodies. Perhaps. Then again, his work might just be exquisite nonsense. (Not that it makes much difference either way.)

Hitchcock has been dishing up obscure pleasures for over a decade in other ways too. Ever since his days with the Soft Boys, he has always explored the territory between the college rock underground and outer space. His work with the Egyptians — his current gang of collaborators — seems to have the potential to be the next best thing. Luckily, the Man Who Invented Himself has so far managed to escape the corrupting influence of superstardom.

REVIEW

Perhaps the liner notes to his most well-known album, Globe of Frogs (1987) explains this situation.

Hitchcock writes: "My contention is — and it's a bloody obvious one — that beneath our civilized glazing we're all deviants, all alone and all peculiar. This flies in the face of mass marketing, but I'm sticking with it."

His world is filled with the best things from the world that the rest of us inhabit — seashores, trains and hydrangeas. But this realm is often visited by some slightly sinister creatures as well: grubs, spiders and sundry scaly things. In fact, Hitchcock seems to have a lyrical obsession with marine biology. But the most strange and wondrous being at the Iron Horse had an English accent, played a six-string and wore a floral print shirt.

The show was dominated by songs from his latest album, Eye. The bittersweet and sensual "Linctus House," followed by one in a similar vein, "Agony of Pleasure," were two of the best from his latest LP.

"Clean Steve," a somewhat disappointing Dylan rip-off, was enlivened by impromptu lyrics about international currency exchange and the oddities of syntax. He also performed the haunting and relatively famous "Madonna of the Wasps." Hitchcock finished his set with "Ted, Woody and Junior" an ode to communal bathing with the catchy refrain, "And they covered each other with soap."

The evening certainly had its slow moments, but Hitchcock's eerie vocals generally worked well with the droning but hypnotic chords of his guitar. At times it was unclear whether the right response to a song was insane giggling or quiet tears. Speaking between numbers, he managed to bring up everything from multi-colored pus to the Walt Disney film Pinnocchio. These comments were often very involved and always entertaining. Hitchcock made certain that he left everyone at the Iron Horse "happy over their candles."

Opening the show was the Jody Grind, an Atlanta combo boasting surf guitar, stand-up bass and torchy vocal work. They performed a bluesy recital of the multiplication tables, and actually got away with it. Hopefully, we'll hear a lot from them in the near future.

Aztec Two Step show stocked with atmosphere to fire your spirit

By ADAM McCLORY
Collegian Correspondent

Aztec Two Step
Iron Horse
Friday, Oct. 12

I think groups like Aztec Two Step were formed for the sole purpose of playing at places like the Iron Horse. The two entities go hand in hand; the crowd, most of whom were in their mid to upper 20s, sat back and listened to the duo pick away at their guitars. This group is perfect to relax with, sit down, have a nice meal and drink a Newcastle Brown Ale or sip at a glass of Moet Chandon.

The show itself was enjoyable. Aztec Two Step, who are Rex Fowler and Neal Shulman, played two fun-filled sets. The first consisted of 11 songs over the course of an hour and after a 20-minute stoppage, they came back to enlighten the crowd for about another hour. The combination of guitar and harmonica rolled into a folky-type of sound, made this show a rousing success.

The songs that they played seemed to relay feelings of the different stages of life. The first song "We Danced," seemed to be a reminiscence of childhood. Along with the two guitars was the pleasure of hearing Fowler play the harmonica.

REVIEW

The second song was more mellow. It was about love and how it effects you — "When I'm with you baby/I'm walking on air."

Aztec Two Step continued to span young adulthood by singing a song about traveling — "My Friend Billy" got the crowd excited as they cheered and clapped in unison.

The next song was hilarious. It was a description of New York City on a "normal" day; the song was dotted with some great lines such as "If you value your life/Carry a gun and a knife."

The crowd was delighted as Fowler combined his guitar skills while singing lines like "'Cause loving you has made my life brand new." The song culminated with a good deal of applause from the nearly sold-out Iron Horse.

Throughout the two sets, the crowd was treated to some great gems from the two performers. During one song, Fowler seemed to be making fun of rock and roll. He said, "I dreamt I was playing lead guitar for Zeppelin," and then he stepped on the distortion peddle and began to strum at the guitar furiously. This short fantasy lead into a knee-slapping, hand-clapping sing-a-long with the crowd.

The show was quite interesting. It opened up my ears to a different type of music — a very soft, mellow, happy type of music. I really recommend it for a lift up from troubles — it would definitely do the trick.

★Attention★
To further the esthetic value of this feature, we now present Ida Hornkill, a Tower Librarian, reading an original piece of poetry.
Ahem.
'The Overdue Book', By Ida Hornkill.
'Do you smell the summer rain?; Yes—
Do you hear the song of the nightingale?; Yes.
But where is that book on 18th Century Dentistry?'
'It is not here, not close to my tender bosom.
O, punishment and fears on he who takes it from me;
I hope they fall down a well.'
The End.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Impatience can land you in hot water. Better keep a steady hand on the controls. A financial decision requires further research. Be willing to pay for expert advice. Let partner know how things stand.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You may be able to do volume business in terms of buying and selling today. Confidential correspondence puts you in the know and in the chips. Good timing is the secret to success.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Get an early start today to beat out the competition. Finance and friendship will not mix. Postpone asking for favors. The storm has passed on the domestic front. Distant events have golden potential.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) A vivid memory may haunt you. Do not read too much into a dream; it could be misleading. Member of opposite sex may try to spring a surprise. Stay on your toes!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Your gift for gab is superb. Excellent conditions exist for you to share in the wealth of others. The secret is to get out and circulate. An elegant appearance will attract new admirers!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Exercise greater care when handling money. Devote more attention to personal matters. Clandestine dealings are best avoided. Protect yourself by keeping detailed records.

LIBRA (Sept. 23- Oct. 22) Take a firm stand with someone who is disrupting your domestic tranquility. Romance will take on a special glow over a quiet dinner. It tomorrow is your birthday, celebrate in style and go to Bob Mould on Sunday. Your buddies are counting on you.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Be on the lookout for a new financial opportunity connected with real estate. Property improvements must be made to bring top dollar. Limit money spent on entertaining.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) A business trip may have to be postponed due to lack of funds. Economize by performing more services for yourself. Do not disguise your true feelings about a romantic encounter. Don't neglect household chores.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Charity work brings you a feeling of fulfillment. Tackle a do-it-yourself project designed to beautify your home. Seek mate's help. Those who paint and putter together often stay together!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20- Feb. 18) Even routine tasks can be stimulating if you approach them from a fresh angle. Someone influential is impressed by your original thinking. Emphasize your ability to adapt.

PICES (Feb. 19-March 20) Guard against emotional tizzies in romance. Think positive! Stop playing head games, reveal your true feelings for a "friend." You will make great progress all week long. Selfish motives may prevent you from receiving a business associate's cooperation.

running on the same amount of funds as 1980, according to Steve Micheli, a SGA senator.

He said his administration has estimated the passage of question three would increase tuition by $700 next semester, force the termination of 88 faculty, and close two buildings on campus, including the arts center.

At Westfield State College, SGA president Keith McKittrick said his campus has sustained the 3-4 percent cuts without any faculty or program reductions. However, the Westfield Board of Trustees has moved to declare fiscal exigency to void faculty union contracts.

McKittrick said there would be some program reduction if CLT passed, and tuition would increase by $1,000.

Framingham State College SGA president Greg Rotatori said a fee of $470 will be imposed on students next semester due to budget reductions. Also, he said the administration is "intensifying" efforts to save money through building closures and a hiring freeze. He said there has been discussion of ending the school year earlier.

Question three on the Framingham campus would force a $1,000 tuition increase, layoffs of tenured faculty, and decreased student enrollment.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Want to know if Donald Trump is contributing to your favorite congressman? Care to see if Tom Cruise is getting involved in politics?

Now you can find out without getting up from your desk. The Federal Election Commission has just folded a new wrinkle into its computer program. The addition, provided by a Massachusetts computer company, gives extraordinary access to campaign finance information to investigative reporters, opposing political campaigns or just plain folks who happen to have the appropriate computer modem.

Under the new program, a caller could tap into the FEC's database and plug in a name — Donald Trump, Tom Cruise, Richard Nixon, whoever — and see if that person has contriuted to any candidates for federal office. The computer would find all contributions and the amounts and the dates of the donations.

Women's xc finishes strong

Johnson, Liljebald finish 1-2

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's cross country team had a successful but wet Saturday. Although hampered by the rain, UMass dominated its meet, defeating Rhode Island, Vermont and New Hampshire to finish the regular season at 5-3.

The final score was UMass 28, URI 38, UVM 68, and UNH 102.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere and the team are now setting their sights on the postseason. UMass travels to New York City for the Atlantic 10 championship meet this Saturday, and will compete the following week in the New England championships.

"The team ran fantastic today," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "The rain was tough but we ran hard."

"I almost fell down about 15 times during the race," said top UMass finisher Becky Johnson. "The rain was terrible but we still ran pretty well"

UMass simply had too much talent for the other New England teams to compete with. UMass was lead by Johnson and freshman Kelly Liljebald, who finished the race in first and second repectively.

"Before the race Kelly and I decided we wanted to come in one and two," said Johnson. "It was awesome when we finally did it. This was a great way to finish the year, we are just hitting our stride for the championship season."

Also running well for UMass was Kathy Holt, Cathy Crocker, and Dana Goldfarb.

"The top five runners were outstanding," said Lafreniere. "Kathy Holt ran her best race of the season and Cathy Crocker was solid as always. It is also good to see Dana run well again."

"Our times were slow today because of the weather but I liked how well we competed."

LaFreniere said she is very pleased with the regular season and her team is right where she wants it as the postseason approaches. At the New Englands, UMass will get another shot at arch rival Connecticut.

"We can't wait to get Connecticut at the New Englands," said LaFreniere. "We are still mad that they beat us last week."

Polo wins two in tourney

By JOE DEGLORIA
Collegian Correspondent

It was a very encouraging weekend for the University of Massachusetts water polo team, which won two of three contests at the Eastern Varsity Invitational at Brown University.

UMass and went into the event reeling from a loss to Iona two weeks previous, but turned things around at Brown, winning two out of three games against top twenty teams.

On Saturday, UMass and Harvard battled through two overtime periods before UMass came out on top 10-9. Jon Miller scored four goals in the contest and Scott Reed threw in the game winner with 54 seconds left in the second overtime.

"We played very well, I was pleased with the team's attitude and effort," said elated UMass coach Russ Yarworth. "With all of the time off we did a lot of work with conditioning, and it really paid off for us."

"This will be a big turnaround for the team and now they will be heading in the right direction. We needed these wins to prove that we are for real," Yarworth said.

After beating Harvard, UMass faced 12th-ranked Brown in the second round, and Brown went on to win the game by a 12-7 score. Despite losing the game, Yarworth said he was not at all disappointed with the team's play.

"Brown is really strong team and we played them tough. I was impressed by our effort," Yarworth said.

Slippery Rock was the next opponent for UMass. The 17th ranked Slippery Rock team was beaten by UMass 8-6. The close affair was highlighted by the outstanding defensive play by UMass goalie Todd Larsen.

"Larsen was awesome, he made a lot of saves and was stealing the ball as well." Yarworth said of the sophomore goaltender.

UMass, now 9-5, will participate in the New England Tournament next weekend.

"This win gives us a tremendous amount of confidence," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "This is a team that's just been crushing people, I don't know if we'll move up into the top four, but certainly with our big win over New Hampshire, and this win today, we've established ourselves as definitely a team to contend with."

Reds smudge Brown in double OT marathon, tie Hartford

Kater scores twice in UMass win No. 1 in region

The Reds beat Brown, ranked No. 10 in the nation and No. 2 in New England, 2-1 yesterday in Providence. On Saturday, UMass sloshed to a 1-1 tie with Hartford.

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, now 6-4-2, should leap to the top of the New England polls this week after tying No. 2 Hartford on Saturday and beating No. 1 Brown yesterday.

Coach Jim Rudy described the Reds 2-1, double-overtime defeat of Brown yesterday as and "unbelievable game."

After scoring on an April Kater penalty kick late in the first half, UMass had things under control, said Rudy, until Browns' Nikki Arbor knotted the score at 1-1 off a cornerkick with 10 minutes to play in regulation.

UMass "bombarded" Brown goalkeeper Kathy Tarnoff in overtime, breaking through for the game-winner in the 107th minute on Kater's second goal of the game.

Brown, now 8-2, had several dangerous cornerkick chances in the final moments of the game, and had one shot bang off the crossbar.

"We dominated, but they played for corners and they're excellent at it," said Rudy. "It's a great win, and it's going to go a long way to locking up a [NCAA] tournament bid."

Saturday at rain-soaked Boyden, Hartford and UMass played to a 1-1 draw. UMass scored four minutes into the second half, when Robin Runstein fed Michele Woodside for a header.

The skies opened up soon after, however, and the rain wreaked havoc. With 10 minutes to play, Hartford's Rose Daly kicked a muddy ball from keeper Skye Eddy's grasp, tying the score for good.

If Eddy had posession of the ball then the goal should have been waved off, though Rudy said, "if we've got to rely on penalties to win games then were not doing well enough."

The game ended with Kater lofting a free kick on goal, where keeper Karen Romero stretched to tap it over the crossbar and preserve the tie.

"We played quite a nice game until it became impossible to play," said Rudy.

The Reds must now recuperate to face Harvard, which Rudy described as "not ranked, but not easy," Tuesday at Upper Boyden Field.

Field hockey finally breaks through

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The oooing and ahhhing at Totman Field Sunday was so loud that it reached the residents of Sylvan. Every whistle, every shift, every shot, and every save provoked the capacity crowd to oooh and ahhh.

When it was over, the Totman faithful stood and applauded the effort put forth by the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, which emerged from a drenched Totman field with a hard-fought 1-0 win over Penn State, the No. 2 ranked team in the nation.

Mara Frattasio, who was taken out of the game with 16 minutes left because she looked tired, according to UMass coach Pam Hixon, scored the game's only goal with 2:26 left on the scoreboard.

"The next thing I know, Nancy (Philbrick) and I are at the stroke spot, and we're scrambling, and Nancy passed it over, and I hit it in," Frattasio said of her game winning goal. "It went really slow but it went in."

It was a weekend dream come true for UMass. First the Minutewomen handled 14th ranked New Hampshire on Friday 4-0, and then second ranked Penn State yesterday.

Friday's game saw Dawn Trumbauer and Kerri Fagan score two goals each. Trumbauer lined up on the wing for all the penalty corners and managed to blast one by UNH goalie Stacey Gaudette. Fagan scored both of her goals on penalty corner slap shots that found the wood in the back of the net.

"This is the first game we used those different types of penalty corners, and it worked, so hopefully it will work against Penn State," Trumbauer said after Friday's game.

Trumbauer failed to score against the Lady Lions, but her presence on the wing was enough of a threat to draw a defender away from Fagan and Beth Thornton, who lined up at the top of the circle. As a result of the defender sprinting off of the line to cover Trumbauer, Fagan and Thornton each had a split second more to tee off. It was Thornton's blast that ignited the whole sequence in front of the net when Frattasio scored.

"It's the first big game we've won, they're No. 2 two we're No. 11, it should boost us way up," Frattasio said. "It's a psychological win for us, we finally pulled through in a big one."

"The difference came in the second half when UMass put a little more pressure on us, they bared down," said Penn State coach Charlene Morett-Newman. "We had times inside our 25 where we didn't [bare down]. I felt that UMass really wanted it more than we did."

Men's soccer drops one, ties one

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team didn't meet its goal of winning both its games this past weekend. But you could hardly call the two-game road trip a disaster.

The Minutemen bounced back from a 4-2 loss at West Virginia Friday to tie George Washington 0-0 in two overtimes on Sunday, in Washington DC.

Although the Colonials dominated the game statistically, UMass played stifling defense and had better scoring chances, according to coach Jeff Gettler.

"Our entire defense played brilliantly," said Gettler of his back four players.

GW was on a two-game winning streak, having mauled Rhode Island 10-0 on Friday. Yet, the Minutemen held the Colonials scoreless for 120 minutes.

Offensively, Gettler cited three near-misses for UMass, including a Randy Jacobs would-be goal that was called back on an offsides call. Jacobs almost won the game in the first overtime, but his breakaway chance went just wide of the post. Gettler said GW "didn't threaten" offensively.

Friday, UMass was victimized by an opportunistic WVU offense that Gettler described as "cashing in on every mistake we made." The Mountaineers took a 1-0 lead on a Leon Barnes goal, which Gettler took issue with. "He was clearly offsides," said Gettler.

Dan Lawrence, who scored both UMass goals, tied the game 1-1 later in the first half. On an indirect kick, Pete McEvoy sent the ball to Arron Zandy, who left the ball for Lawrence to drill into the left corner.

The Mountaineers then rattled off three unanswered scores in the second half to put the match away. Tony Henson, Paul Marco and John Keating all put shots past John Gruber (two saves) for the Mountaineers.

Lawrence finished the scoring late in the game when he took a pass from the right and drilled it into the left corner for his third goal of the year.

Volleyball remains winless in A-10

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's volleyball team knew it was going to have a tough match on its hands when it was slated to play the University of Rhode Island last Friday.

After all, the two teams are not exactly headed in the same direction: UMass entered the match mired at the bottom of the Atlantic 10 conference with an 0-4 record, while the Rams were leading the charge to the A-10 Championships with a 4-0 mark.

After the match, the Minutewomen realized their fears of URI were not unfounded.

"We expected it," said coach Carol Ford of her team's loss to Rhode Island in three games, 4-15, 4-15 and 6-15.

"Our main difficulty was tempo," said Ford. "Our players had a tough time keeping up."

Along with tempo, Ford also noted blocking and passing as two major trouble areas in the match, but said she was pleased with the effort of the UMass defense.

"The passing was not good at all," Ford said. "Defensively we didn't do a bad job. The scores don't indicate the defense."

Before the match, Ford said she was looking more for her team to turn in a quality performance, and didn't emphasize winning or losing.

But even though her team performed well on defense, Ford said she was not happy with quality of the overall match.

"We're not playing up to our potential against our opponents," said Ford, who has been saying all season long that if the Minutewomen play to the best of their abilities they can beat anybody.

"The confidence is not there."

UMass has a lot of tough matches coming up, but Ford insists there are several teams the Minutewomen are capable of beating if they play up to their potential.

With the loss, the Minutewomen drop to 3-16 overall and 0-5 in the A-10, while URI improves to 11-5 overall and 5-0 in the conference.

tropical storm, he was "sick," he said; "because of the type of running we do, I wanted a fast track. But it didn't seem to be a problem out there."

Quarterback Gary Wilkos, playing with a heavily-taped sprained thumb on his throwing hand, rushed for 143 yards and one touchdown. Fullback David Mitchell added a 114 yards and a touchdown on 25 carries, and tailback John Johnson netted 60 yards, including a 1-yard touchdown plunge in the second quarter that gave UMass the lead.

After Benton completed five passes in a 79-yard scoring drive that gave the Huskies a 7-6 lead in the first quarter, UMass scored 32 unanswered points, including 22 in the second quarter.

The key play in that stretch was a fumble by UConn's Mark Chapman on the kickoff following Mitchell's touchdown, which had put UMass up 21-7. Chapman was stripped on the UConn 18 yard line, from where Wilkos connected with split end Ron Blauvelt three plays later for a touchdown.

Blauvelt leaped over cornerback Mike Searcy and twisted back toward Wilkos to make the catch, then landed with one foot inside the orange end zone pylon. Marco Gabrielli's kick gave UMass a 28-7 lead at the half.

Benton and the UConn offense, meanwhile, had ground to a dead stop. At one stretch near the end of the half, Benton fumbled five of six snaps from center.

"It wasn't the exchange. When [Benton] started to come back with the ball it squirted loose," said Jackson. "It kills you, you're completely out of sync."

Minuteman center Jay Gabbe said an extra "split second" was the difference on the UMass side of the ball, where the snaps were clean most of the day. "We emphasized it from the beginning," said Gabbe. "If [Wilkos] doesn't get the ball, he can't run a play."

Benton was pulled in the second half and replaced by the 1988 Yankee Conference Offensive Player-of-the-Year, senior Matt DeGennaro, who completed 13 of 26 passes for 138 yards and two touchdowns as UConn scored the last 12 points of the game.

DeGennaro broke Tom Ehrhardt's all-time Yankee Conference pass completion mark in the third quarter with a five yard toss to Mark Didio.

Duffey, faculty clarify cost-cutting proposals

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

President-Chancellor Duffey met with University of Massachusetts faculty and staff yesterday afternoon in an effort to clarify current proposals by the University to cut costs.

A midyear fee increase for students, another round of departmental cuts, and a five-day furlough plan for all University employees are part of a proposal to deal with the $10.6 million in cuts imposed upon UMass since September.

Duffey proposed these three actions to alleviate the cuts yesterday in Bowker Auditorium, at an open-mike forum for all employees.

Duffey cited the need for "retrenchment conditions," saying the state "economy is in a deep recessional spiral."

He also said this recession was different from the one induced by President Reagan almost 10 years ago, because it is being felt by both "the government and the professionals."

The request for the mid-semester fee increase is "difficult," said Duffey. The level of the increase has not yet been determined.

Duffey said there would be a special scholarship fund raised for those in need, saying there was $600,000 already in the fund. Duffey said he thinks, "one-third of the students fall into that category [in need of aid]."

The cutting of student services also add to the difficulty in implementing a fee increase for the following semester. Duffey said the campus is a residence for 12,000 students. These students spend more time out of the classroom, which is part of the experience, and these services stress the importance of undergraduate life.

The library and the computer center, untouched by previous rounds of cuts are scheduled to be reduced, with the library's cut being $250,000. "These cuts alone are not enough," said Duffey, and the adminstration will again look at the base budgets after July 1.

The five-day furlough program for employees will only work if the five representing unions of the campus agree on the arrangement, said Duffey.

Stressing the nature of the problem, Duffey said, "If we don't do something like [the furlough program] there will be across-the-board layoffs."

Duffey said there was a priority of maintaining the level of excellence at UMass.

"We will see what kind of concensus [the administration and the unions] can bring together," he said.

An unidentified senior faculty member, seeing the furlough as a "next-to-last alternative," agreed to the idea of a furlough.

The faculty member said self-pride in the University was one factor for agreeing to a furlough.

"In terms of the alternatives . . . it is at least tolerable," said the faculty member.

He also said, "It's a much better alternative than individual members of the community leaving."

Student coalition petitions for three demands to salvage EWC

"Chants aren't going to get you anywhere because they seem to fall on deaf ears at this University," a woman said as a group of 15 students, angered and discouraged by severe cuts to the Everywoman's Center trekked across campus to the Student Affairs office yesterday afternoon.

In a third attempt to negotiate with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, a coalition of students arrived at his office yesterday with more than 500 signatures, collected in less than six hours, outlining three demands:

- Restoration of the two positions recently transferred out of the EWC.
- The option for student representatives to offer input into all decisions made about further, as well as present and most recent budget cuts.
- A statement from Madson's office confirming a commitment to the future existence of the EWC.

In response to state budget cuts that necessitated a $440,000 reduction in Student Affairs spending, Madson transferred the coordinator of the Counseling Program and the coordinator of the Outreach and Referral Program from EWC into Mental Health Services and the Financial Aid Office, respectively.

Since that decision, doubt has arisen, from those concerned about cuts to EWC, over whether administrators

Bernstein to be buried in NY today

By JUDIE GLAVE
The Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Flags at Lincoln Center were at half-staff Monday, and the New York Philharmonic said it will play the music of Leonard Bernstein rather than Beethoven in memory of the American musical titan.

Bernstein, whose passion at the podium, versatility as a composer and performances on television helped make him the nation's leading classical musician, died Sunday at his New York City apartment.

He died of sudden cardiac arrest caused by progressive lung deterioration from a tumor and emphysema, four days after he retired on doctor's orders. His son, Alexander, was at his side.

A private burial was scheduled for Tuesday at the Greenwood Cemetery in Brooklyn, where his late wife, actress Felicia Montealegre, is buried.

Bernstein wrote the scores for such classics as On The Town and West Side Story. He also lured countless thousands of baby-boomers into the world of classical music with his Emmy Award-winning Young People's Concerts.

"He was the most unique musician of this century,

UMass professors say Gorbachev deserves Nobel Prize

From staff reports
and The Associated Press

Professors at the University of Massachusetts said President Mikhail S. Gorbachev "deserves" the 1990 Nobel Peace Prize for his international role both in Europe and in relations with the United States.

Gorbachev won prize yesterday for opening up Soviet society to reform, helping to slow down the arms race and allowing Eastern Europe to break free of Soviet domination.

Soviet historian Robert Jones, a professor in the history department, said Gorbachev earned the prize for his actions, including arms reduction, but also for actions he did not take such as opposing the democracy movement in Europe.

"These are reasonable positions but unexpected from a leader of the Soviet Union and deserving of recognition and encouragement," he said.

Professor Karl Ryavec, a political scientist specializing in Soviet politics and foreign policy, echoed Jones' comments about a reduced degree of confrontation between the U.S. and the Soviet Union but was skeptical of the aims of the prize.

"I can't help thinking that the award is designed to bolster Gorbachev's position at home, which is very weak indeed," he said. "The Soviet Union is threatening to break up, the economy continues to deteriorate and much of year's harvest has been lost in the fields."

In awarding the 59-year-old Soviet leader the $700,000 prize, the Norwegian Nobel

Congress set to debate higher tax for the rich

WASHINGTON (AP) — The final budget plan that will emerge from Congress will mean sharply higher taxes for upper-income Americans, Majority Leader George Mitchell said yesterday.

The House and Senate are expected to approve rival deficit reduction plans this week in an effort to keep the government from shutting down for the second time this month.

House Democrats are calling for an increase in the top rate paid by the wealthiest, from 28 percent to 33 percent. The Senate Finance Committee is proposing limiting deductions that can be claimed by upper-income taxpayers, which also would serve to increase taxes on the wealthy.

The administration opposes the House Democratic plan, which would require higher-income taxpayers to bear abut two-thirds of the proposed tax increase.

President Bush told reporters on Air Force One yesterday that he met in a morning meeting with minority leaders Rep. Bob Michel, R-Ill., and Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan.

He said they were "pretty much on the same wave length" in preferring the Senate Finance committee proposal over the House Democratic plan.

But Bush, en route to Texas for the first stop of a two-day campaign trip, refused to say what he might do about taxes.

"That managed to get a little confused last week, so what I'll do is to say the action's in the Congress and I will take a look at what comes out," he said. "We've indicated to our leaders our preferences."

Mitchell, D-Maine, told reporters he hoped the two versions could be blended "to get an even more progressive tax package."

Bush and Congress have been negotiating for months on a deficit-reduction plan to cut spending and increase taxes by about $500 billion over five years.

Mitchell said the burden on the rich would be considerably higher under the Senate Finance Committee bill compared with a plan worked out among congressional leaders and the White House. That agreement was rejected by the House.

The Finance Committee bill includes a nine-and-a-half-cent-a-gallon increase of the tax on gasoline.

The House Democratic version would forgo any increase in the gasoline tax, relying instead on delaying an adjustment in the higher income taxes on everyone who files a return.

The government's spending authority expires at midnight Friday and Presdient Bush has said he will veto any stop-gap extension unless a deficit reduction is approved.

Iraq promises to crush U.S. aggression

By ANDREA HAMILTON
Associated Press Writer

Iraq yesterday vowed to crush any aggression by the United States and its allies. The sharply-worded statement was apparently intended to counter suggestions that Saddam Hussein was becoming flexible about withdrawing from Kuwait.

Also yesterday, U.S. Defense Secretary Richard Cheney said the United States is prepared to keep troops in Saudi Arabia for years. "We're there as long as the Saudis want us . . . as long as it takes to get the job done. And no one should underestimate our staying power," Cheney said in London.

"Time is much more likely to be on our side than it is on his side," Cheney said, referring to Saddam.

Iraq's statement in Al-Thaura, the newspaper of the ruling Baath Party, said Iraqis "are prepared to meet the American troops."

If they start the war, we will make it a catastrophe for those who ignite it," the editorial said. "The destruction will be total."

The statement apparently referred to Saudi Arabia and other countries taking part in the U.S.-led multinational force that assembled in the Persian Gulf region after Iraq's Aug. 2 invasion of Kuwait.

Initially, the stated purpose of those forces was to defend Saudi Arabia, but there have been indications some Western leaders are losing patience with the effectiveness of economic sanctions and are considering an attack to drive Iraq from Kuwait. Exiled Kuwait officials have encouraged that course.

"We will make them be sorry for listening to the advice of their little stooges in the area," Al-Thaura said. "All the American interests and those of its allies inside and outside the region will explode, and the fires will eat them at the first hour of their aggression against Iraq."

Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat said Sunday that Saddam was showing a "certain flexibility" regarding his claims to Kuwait, and urged all countries involved in the Gulf crisis to follow suit.

Arafat spoke at a news conference in Tunis after meeting with the French foreign minister and after seeing Saddam in Baghdad. He did not elaborate on his statement.

Saddam said on Aug. 12 that he would negotiate a withdrawal from Kuwait only if talks were also held on the Palestinian issue.

Diplomatic sources in Baghdad said Arafat is trying to persuade the Iraqis to talk with the French, who suggested Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait might be linked to an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The Soviet's Novosti press agency also reported Saddam showed signs of flexibility. It said Saddam indicated to Soviet envoy Yevgeny Primakov recently he might remove his troops in exchange for some Kuwaiti territory in the gulf.

An editor at the official Iraqi News Agency denied Sunday that Iraq had made any such offer.

Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze yesterday assured Soviet legislators the Kremlin has no plans to join the multinational force in the Gulf.

realize the need for a full-fledged women's center. During the past three years, EWC has lost two-thirds of its direct service programs.

Madson invited a small group of students to his office two weeks ago in order to "discuss the situation."

Larissa Diephuis said she had good expectations, but could not think too positively about the invitation. "I'm not really sure what's going to happen. It probably won't accomplish much."

Maggie Magner, a main organizer of the event and supporter of EWC said, "It was very clear by the end of the meeting that it was not that he could not transfer those two positions back to the EWC, but that he would not."

In response to this, and with the hopes of some discourse, the group arrived yesterday to find that Madson was out sick for the day. Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin spoke on behalf of Madson.

She explained that the transfer decision is final. She said services across campus will not remain what students have become accustomed to. Vanin said there could be no promise that EWC would still exist, but emphasized commitment to the Center.

"It is the intention of Madson, as well as myself to maintain direct services. We have values, but outside forces are infringing on those values."

Magner said students understand it is a time of great fiscal crisis, but that in time of great crisis, acts of violence increase, especially acts against women and to take away available resources for women is ludicrous.

Inside trader reveals crime mindset

By LARS KROIJER
Collegian Correspondent

At the age of 38 Dennis Levine has learned his lesson. It does not pay to break the rules in order to make some easy money.

Levine, arrested for insider trading in 1986, gave a lecture on "The Inside Story of an Inside Trader" last night at the Campus Center Auditorium. The talk was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

"I was consumed by the world I worked in. I continuously set myself higher goals and it was never enough. I did not know where to draw the line," Levine said. In 1984, Levine was offered a position as managing director for Drexel, a Wall Street brokerage firm. At first, Levine provided "hot tips" without receiving money, but later he was financially compensated for his information. According to Levine, the media often describes inside traders as "arrogant and sophisticated people," trying to make easy money.

However, he added that these people are flesh and blood like everyone else. "They are often motivated by other things than money. It's a kind of sickness," he said.

Although he acknowledged that the decade of the 1980s was known for the slogan "Greed is good," Levine said greed is "for those whom the status quo is not enough."

He added that it is still very possible to reach the top through hard work and creativity. "[Insider trading] is not worth it. My former life was destroyed because I figured the odds were 1,000 to one against me getting caught. Freedom is a right not worth losing," he said.

Levine lost his freedom in February of 1987, when he entered prison in Lewisburg, PA, where he served for 15 months. In addition, he had to pay full financial restitution for the $11.5 million dollars he had earned in illegal profits.

He said that the pressure to gain good results in a competitive market sometimes drives people to make use of a "hot tip."

Two-thirds of the largest corporations in the United States have at one time been involved in illegal trading, he said. The laws have been changed so that convicted insider traders are more likely to go to jail, he said.

"The government is very smart and creative, but I had to learn it the hard way.

International program to sponsor 1990 fair

UMass students relate good experiences while studying overseas

By PAMELA McCARTHY
Collegian Staff

Once a year, tables line the Campus Center concourse with posters of distant lands, ancient buildings, and faraway cities.

This year, the International Programs Office is sponsoring their annual study abroad fair.

"The fair is an opportunity for students to tell students about exchanges worldwide," said Maryelise Lamet, associate director of overseas programs at IPO.

Several students who went overseas had a truckload of things to tell anyone who would listen. This may be the reason why students who returned from an overseas exchange staff the fair, the information tables and the International Programs Office.

Lynn Hindley, an IPO staff member, said she is enthusiastic about studying abroad. She spent a year in Denmark. She added students who study abroad gain academically, because "they are learning from a different perspective.

"Students learn about new people, customs, traits and a whole different way from how they are," she said. Hindley also said students benefit because they can be on the spot when events occur, a recent example being the razing of the Berlin Wall.

Joshua Fontanez, who spent a year in Spain, said, "I've always wanted to go. I was interested in what Spanish culture is all about."

Fontanez said he got two different impressions of Spanish culture because he spent time in Segovia, a small town, and Madrid, the capital.

"The woman I lived with [in Segovia] came from a farming background, so I was able to relate it to my mother's experience, since she came from a small farm in Puerto Rico," he said.

The woman he stayed with in Madrid was a different story, however, he said.

"They are very status oriented. You know the nobles who keep their titles after they lose their money? That's her," he said.

Fontanez said he still yearns for some things Spanish, even though he has been home for awhile. "I miss the people. They have strong characters — they are not too apologetic as here in America."

If there is anything Kathryn Hollander said she misses about Taiwan, it is the hospitality.

"People thought nothing of taking me into their home and giving me dinner . . . people went out of their way to help me," she said. "Because of that, I go out of my way to help people."

She said that in Taiwan people would try to overcome the language barrier, "but in America, forget it!"

Hollander said she learned more than academics in Taiwan.

"I went to build language skills. But I got more than that. I became more aware of the U.S. in a global perspective," she said. "If anything I became more patriotic — I wasn't embarrassed to say I was American."

She said she learned more about Asian world events, such as the civil war in Burma and the conflict over sovereignty between Taiwan and the People's Republic of China.

Hollander said that anyone who is tall, blond, and blue-eyed, as well as loud and promiscuous is seen as a typical American. She said she also had her own ideas about Taiwan.

"I tried to go over without any preconceptions, but that's impossible. I expected something like New York's Chinatown," she said. "What I found was a society that was far more industrialized than I expected, a strong economy, but a conflict between the old ways and the new."

Karen Fante, who recently returned from Italy, said she found stereotypes also. She said American women were seen as "easy" and that Americans were seen as bad students.

"It's bad in a way, but its kind of true . . . Americans were there for a European experience."

Fante said her Italian roots drew her to Italy.

The International fair will be held tomorrow from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. There is always a table from the IPO office on the concourse Monday and Wednesday from 11:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m.

Single mother on welfare gears up for gov.'s race

Editor's note: The Collegian will be profiling candidates contending for public office locally and statewide to preview the Nov. 6 election.

By BROOKE R. BURTON
Collegian Correspondent

A single mother living on welfare, Dorothy Stevens is now an Independent write-in candidate for the 1990 governor's race.

Stevens said her following is growing as the poor communities find that the choices for governor become fewer.

"People in the communities from the West to Leominster and Brookline are saying 'you are our only alternative,'" Stevens said. Stevens is sending her election committees to several towns to spread awareness about her write-in campaign.

Stevens said she has felt excluded from any coverage in the Massachusetts' media since the beginning of her campaign. After press conferences and television interviews with major networks, Stevens said she is not mentioned as a candidate for governor.

"This is a poor people's campaign," said Stevens. "Any one can participate, but if you don't have the money, you don't get the votes."

Stevens' campaign slogan is, "We have a right to thrive, not barely survive."

According to Stevens, she has received more national press than local coverage.

"I've been on Phil Donohue, Sally Jesse Raphael, Attitudes, and I did a West Coast radio show with Paul Bloom." After a recent press conference with all of Massachusetts' major newspapers, Stevens' story was put in the back pages of the Boston Globe Metro-Region section.

Despite recent publicity problems,

Stevens said she hopes to speak for those people in the poorer communities that have been ignored for the past decade. No other candidate, she said, could understand these questions more, considering she is the only candidate that has experienced poverty first hand. Massachusetts' budget priorities need to be changed, Stevens said. Forty percent of businesses are going without paying taxes, while their employees are barely surviving and are homeless because they cannot afford to buy a home or pay rent.

"It is very expensive to be poor," she said.

Stevens said she has received a great deal of opposition about increasing welfare support. Stevens defended welfare recipients by adding that since most must have a part-time job to survive, they pay a higher percent of taxes on their income than any other tax bracket.

Stevens said she believes in restoring funding to the education budget for better buildings, safer buses, smaller classes and a better education. She said she also thinks it is necessary to offer resources for those who cannot afford a higher education.

Stevens said she is a strong supporter of a woman's right to choose. "The U.S. takes no responsibility for the resources to raise a child," she said.

Stevens is a 48-year-old divorced mother of four. Stevens said she left a battering situation in her last marriage.

Stevens was the Vice President of the National Welfare Rights Union which was started by Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. before his death in 1968. It was in this program that Stevens first became interested in running for political office.

Committee cited him for his "leading role in the peace process which today characterizes important parts of the international community."

"This peace process, which Gorbachev has contributed so significantly to, opens up new possibilities for the world community to solve its pressing problems," said Gidske Anderson, leader of the Nobel Committee.

It was the first award to a superpower chief executive since President Theodore Roosevelt won in 1906.

The committee commended Gorbachev, who rose to power in March 1985, for bringing "greater openness" to Soviet society, producing a slowdown in the arms race and encouraging democratic reform in Eastern Europe.

Gorbachev is the second Soviet to win the prize. The first was nuclear scientist and human rights activist Andrei Sakharov, who won in 1975.

Sakharov, who died in December, was unable to accept the award until 14 years later, when Gorbachev freed him from detention and allowed him to travel.

Gorbachev has overseen the reduction of conventional and nuclear forces in Europe, improved relations with the United States and the toppling of Communist regimes in Eastern Europe.

But the changes Gorbachev has encouraged have been accompanied by bloody ethnic conflicts in Armenia, Azerbaijan and other parts of the Soviet Union.

Bernstein conducted his first New York Philharmonic concert in 1943 at age 25 when he was called on to fill in for Bruno Walter in a nationally broadcast radio concert.

"I walked on with an awful hangover and don't remember another thing until I heard a thunderous ovation," Bernstein once recalled.

A memorial concert is planned for Carnegie Hall on Nov. 14, the 47th anniversary of Bernstein's Philharmonic debut.

In 1958, Bernstein became the Philharmonic's first American-born director and served in that capacity until 1969, when he stepped down to devote more time to composing.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on the page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Neo-liberals key to Democratic life

The accompanying cartoon appeared in the Collegian on April 7, 1989, about a year before John Silber became widely known as a candidate for governor. Of course, I didn't know then that he would become a candidate for governor, but I did believe that he naturally personified the future of the Democratic party in Massachusetts, and I still do.

CHANCELLORMAN TALKS ABOUT HIS HISTORY.
GOSH, CHANCELLORMAN, DID YOU REALLY WORK FOR EUGENE MCCARTHY BACK IN '68?
WHY, YES.
YES, BACK IN THOSE GIDDY DAYS I BELIEVED IN PEACE, JUSTICE, FREEDOM & THE PROMISE OF YOUTH!
WOW.
BUT TIMES CHANGE. NOW I BELIEVE IN BIOTECHNOLOGY, TUITION RETENTION, & STRICT REGULATION IN THE DORMS. I HAVE A NEW HERO NOW.
WHO'S THAT? WILLIAM BENNETT? PAUL TSONGAS?
JOHN SILBER.

Al Arpad

The specific point of the cartoon is that the political philosophy put forth by John Silber (and, for that matter, William Bennett) is not substantially different from the neo-liberal orthodoxy represented by President-Chancellor Duffey or Board of Regents Chair Paul Tsongas.

The term "neo-liberal" is not just a casual buzzword, by the way. It generally has been used by the press to describe politicians, such as Tsongas and Gov. Dukakis, who have tried to bring more conservative (especially business) constituencies into the traditional liberal coalition by promoting increased technical efficiency as a way to improve government solutions to stubborn social problems.

In other words, neo-liberals have been regarded as the key to the future of the Democratic Party and liberalism in general. I say John Silber is one of them. Since this directly contradicts much of what the press has said about Silber during the course of his campaign, some further explanation is in order.

John Silber often has been described as angry and autocratic, while liberals are supposed to be caring and inclusive.

John Silber provoked a small outcry from the small group of public college students that pays attention to such things by calling for the University of Massachusetts to triple tuition. But both Tsongas and Duffey have generally supported this proposal, and were actually enacting tuition and fee increases long before Silber entered the picture. The only significant difference is in the cloak of liberal rhetoric that Tsongas and Duffey sometimes employ to show that their hearts are in the right respective places.

More and more, however, the rhetoric is shifting. Tsongas, on the editorial page of Monday's Globe, writes angrily of a new Cold War. "The war is for economic survival, for a decent standard of living. We are losing that war."

Yes, his rhetoric is angry, even authoritarian. He writes of a "new economic order." Authoritarian, even Orwellian. Sometimes cartoonists exaggerate, so if you don't believe me, look it up. "Our friends are our enemies," he says. "The nuclear weapons in the war are the weapons of the mind — the education and training of our workforce."

It is, therefore, wrong to say, as Republicans sometimes do, that Duffey, and indeed the entire neo-liberal establishment, are merely deluded leftovers from Roosevelt's New Deal or Johnson's Great Society. It is also wrong to say that John Silber represents change. Actually, neo-liberalism and John Silber represent the natural evolution of a progressive ideology toward authoritarian enforcement of its now fossilized ideals.

Duffey's unbelievably idiotic statement last week that students who can't pay for increased tuition should respond by taking their own parents to court is a clear indication of the absurd lengths to which this line of thinking can and will be taken in the next few years.

But that is why I consider John Silber, a man I personally find frightening, to be the natural embodiment of the immediate future of the Democratic Party in Massachusetts.

An extra shot for a giggle

I don't know what I was thinking when I got dressed to go to Sunday night's Midnight Madness event. As a typical UMass basketball fan, I thought I'd simply don some grubby shorts, a t-shirt and no make-up — all prepared to help cheer on the 1990-91 basketball team at their first practice.

Meredith O'Brien

How silly I was. If I had simply brushed on a little make-up, dressed up a bit more, used cans of hairspray to fluff up my hair, maybe I could have won some money.

You see, our infamous Channel-22 TV sportscaster Rich Tettemer was giving out assorted cash and prizes Sunday night before our beloved team hit the floor around midnight. Airline tickets to Florida, gift certificates to area restaurants and stores, coupons for free sneakers — all for having your ticket number called or for sinking a shot into the small metal hoop.

Tettemer would select a spot on the floor, call out a number and guarantee the lucky person $20, $30, $40 or even $100 if the shot went in. Quite a good offer, considering everyone got in free and was given the same chances as everyone else to win.

But a strange thing began to happen. It all started when a female's number was selected and she was offered a chance to take a shot for $20. All was fine. She took her shot and missed. But when the orange ball refused to do what she wanted it to, she turned around, batted her eyelashes and expected Tettemer to give her another shot. And being an apparent softie for coeds, Tettemer agreed and let her take another shot, which she missed.

But it doesn't stop here — with a dramatic toss of the hair, this woman decided to abuse her looks and ask him for yet another shot.

"Like, ya know Richie, like, tee-hee, couldn't I just get another chance? Pleeease?"

Using dramatic body motions, like her fragile little world would absolutely crumble if denied another shot, Tettemer asked the crowd if she should take another shot. The crowd, buying into and encouraging this shameful sexist act, cheered "yes" and she took another shot, finally managing to sink it in the hoop.

Well, she got her money and a third chance. Maybe it was her perfume or her cute little laugh that allowed her to take a third shot, but I thought the name of the game was basketball, not the dating game.

What then ensued was an absolute disgrace. Following the lead of the woman who successfully snagged herself some crisp green ones for doing nothing but whine, many (not all) of the other women whose numbers were selected that missed their first shot tried to use their looks to get another shot out of Tettemer. Femme fatale galore. And the fans loved it.

Yet, when a few guys went out to shoot, were they allowed second shots? Well, ah-gee, tee-hee, no they weren't. Maybe they didn't giggle enough or toss their hair.

Some of the women, though to their credit, did valiantly relinquish the ball after a failed attempt to sink it, but Tettemer and the crowd insisted they take additional shots.

To women who are constantly trying to ward off the stereotype of mindless sex objects who simply use looks to get the things they want, it is very discouraging to see such a display of manipulative behavior.

If these women only realized how their behavior reflected on the rest of us who don't want an extra shot for a giggle, who simply want an equal and fair shot at not only the basket, but at jobs and promotions, maybe they wouldn't have laughed so loudly.

But I suppose if my number were called, I'd only get one shot because I was dressed like a typical sloppy student. But I suppose I could have finagled an extra shot if I missed the first one. Let me see, how does it go:

"Rich, tee-hee, [flick the hair] another shot for me, please? [eyelashes flutter]. Just one more try? Pleeease?"

Distorted views perpetuate conflict

How do people perceive Northern Ireland? It's full of mad terrorists, randomly attacking innocent people! It's in the evil clutches of Britain whose aim is intimidation through violence!

These statements exemplify how distorted views can perpetuate the situation by giving people the wrong impression. It must be realized that Northern Ireland is a complicated political and religious issue and will continue to be one for a long time.

However, whether the Irish Republican Army (IRA) give warnings or not when they plant a bomb, they have the intent to endanger human life. The implication that Britain is responsible for some of the civilian deaths as a result of the IRA is absurd. The fact is throughout the 80s, the IRA has been responsible for killing 30 innocent people a year, ranging from young children to pensioners.

This unnecessary killing will continue to appall people and does nothing to help resolve the Northern Ireland situation.

A medal for our suffering

A medal! A medal! Our principles for the Pentagon's medal! Oh, Joe, congratulations, baby! Did you polish your little medal? Aren't you proud of it? Did you mount or frame it yet? I heard you're not a bigot. Are you such a "true friend and supporter" because you support opportunity?

Owen Broadhurst

President-Chancellor Duffey was awarded for his support of homophobic institutions on Oct. 3. He has once again demonstrated his total disregard and utter contempt for student concerns by continuing to belittle them.

In response to concerns about how ROTC contributes to the hostile atmosphere lesbians, gays and bisexuals must live in on this campus, he said we were being abusive and 'unfair."

Should we gather, then, that it is right for ROTC to continue to discriminate against us, O "deserving employer?"

Should we gather that your silence in light of recent homophobic assaults is but a natural outgrowth of what obvious pride you have in our University's contribution to phallocentric brutality worldwide? Perhaps it was your decision to have UMass invest in genocidal Monsanto.

This would not be the first time our President-Chancellor has thumbed his nose at a significant portion of the University community.

He once accused the very targets of racism, suggesting that protests against investment in genocidal industries or governments resulted in "racial antagonism" on campus. Previous to that, I was — along with 300 others — accused of "intellectual terrorism" by this man who comforts a genocidal empire called Amerikkka.

Please educate us, O man of "good will" — are you not in contradiction? How can you support our rights and defend us against cries of hate when you continue to defend an institution that actively fosters myths and hostility towards us simply because murder thrills the powers that be?

How many more jaws must be broken for you to realize that you're the problem? As you continue to send contradictory messages about our rights on this campus, about our worth, about University policies that you should enforce on this campus, how dare you say that you support us in our struggle, that you consider yourself an "ally" combatting homophobia?

Prove it!

You continue to be silent as Student Affairs acts to disembowel the Everywoman's Center, demonstrating your resolve for gay rights by violating wimmin's space and eliminating the "coming out" support program.

You have announced publicly your support for the military that oppresses and intentionally maligns us.

You still permit, in the sale of pornography, the continual reinforcement of gender roles and compulsory heterosexuality. You're such an "ally!"

UMass has become a phallocentric playground, a den of homophobia. Your promotional literature never warned us of that. I never thought I'd fear for my life on this campus.

I never thought I'd get death threats for coming out at a school I consider my home. Of course, I never thought a reasonable and intelligent person would advocate a tuition hike — imagining that it would prove affordable — either.

Where's the rage?

How much longer can students on this campus continue to be subjected to violence?

How much longer can we tolerate the University's own encouragement of this violence, and not respond — retaliate — in kind? I can only wonder.

Whitmore's calling.

WOMEN'S ISSUES

An Interview with Doctor Nalini Bhushan of Smith College

By MINU SEBASTIAN
Collegian staff

Dr. Nalini Bhushan is currently an assistant professor of philosophy at Smith College.

As a woman of Indian and American descent, she spent most of her life in India in the city of Madras. It is here that she received her undergraduate degree in Economics and Statistics at Stella Maris College. She then came to the United States for graduate work in philosophy at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.

She had an interest in studying various kinds of philosophies. She soon realized that she would have to put aside her interest in non-western philosophies because the Department of Philosophy at the University of Michigan based itself in the Western analytic tradition of philosophy.

"The Eastern style of philosophy concentrates for the most part on understanding and explication and the student focuses on mastering the texts. In the Western tradition there is a focus on specific kinds of argumentation analyses," she said.

These separate styles of philosophy, she was told by her professor, could not be comfortably combined. As a student of philosophy at the University of Michigan, she was expected to conform to the Western tradition and style. She decided to stay in the program and specialized in Philosophy of Language and Mind, assuming that when she was finished with her degree she could go back and study Indian philosophy on her own time. But after years of concentration in the Western analytic style, she found it somewhat difficult to relate to Indian philosophy.

This raises a general philosophical worry of the following sort: "Is it possible to be trained in a particular tradition and yet do justice to the ideas and style of a tradition that is very different?"

Because she has spent time studying Western philosophy and through her understanding of the Indian cultural context, she has come to the conclusion that she is in a unique position to teach Americans about Indian philosophy. She feels that one way American students can relate to another culture is by introducing it through a base they can understand. By teaching Indian philosophy by comparing the logic of Western and Eastern philosophy, she is optimistic that students will be able to better understand Indian philosophy as something that is not simply "exotic" but as something that deserves serious attention.

She expects to be designing a course in Indian logic in the near future.

As an Indian woman she has found that her perspectives and definitions have changed. By coming to the United States she feels that she has more "freedom" in the sense that she can make her own decisions without the possible interference of others. But she has also lost the security and support that is inherent in the "family network" which is an integral part of the Indian culture that she is from.

After a recent visit to India, she has come to some conclusions about herself as a woman. She has realized that after spending ten years in the United States her concept about what it means to be a woman and what is important to her as a woman has changed. She is no longer willing to become part of the family network where she would have to become assertive and rebellious in order to retain her sense of individuality.

"In India, women are defined differently, they are not necessarily 'oppressed'," she said. "Identities are forged by the role you play in society and roles are connected to the rest of society."

"In the United States, a woman is encouraged to forge an identity on her own. In India, the ideal for a woman is by and large, is to forge an identity through the social network," she said.

As a professor, she has been faced with the question of whether Smith college should become a co-ed institution.

Professor Nalini Bhushan

One of the arguments encouraging the entrance of male students is that the school might be doing a disservice to women by being "softer" on them and that women are not receiving the "rigor" they need.

Dr. Bhushan disagrees. "Judging by the performance of the women in my classes, the students are serious, have high standards and rise to the occasion by asking thoughtful and incisive questions." She taught undergraduates at the University of Michigan as well and thinks that Smith College students are just as challenging to teach.

This semester Professor Bhushan is teaching Nietzsche and the Philosophy of Mind. In the Spring she will be teaching Aesthetics.

Empowerment and self-defense

By Stacy Neale
Collegian Correspondent

Budget cuts to the Escort Service and the Everywomen's center are proof of the declining availability of security services for women. Increasing crime against women is apparent when we remember the murder of Sharon Galligan at the Hampshire Mall last semester. One way for women to feel more secure is to learn a form of martial arts or self-defense.

The Valley Women's Martial Arts of Easthampton provides one alternative to empower women against the rise of crimes against them. The Valley Women's Martial Arts is a non-profit, tax exempt organization that provides women instruction in Shuri-Ryu Karate Okinawan style, Arnif (Filipino stick fighting) and self-defense. They survive on donations, grants and fundraising.

Valley Women's Martial Arts was established in 1977 by Wendi Dragonfire who now resides in the Netherlands. It was originally located in Northampton and has been in Easthampton for 6 years. Beth Holt and Janet Alss, both head instuctors, have run the school since 1982.

The school's main objective is to provide women and children training in self-defense and karate, to help gain skills in the physical, mental and spiritual aspects of martial arts, Beth Holt, the head instructor said.

"We hope to increase self-esteem and self-confidence and to teach the necessary skills for protection and security," Holt said. "We want women to feel confident saying no in uncomfortable situations."

Instruction is offered 6 days a week along with clinics and workshops on all types of self-defense. There is a monthly fee of either $55 for a class that meets twice a week or a $35 fee for one that meets once a week. The monthly fees include unlimited training. There is also a $55 eight week session for adolescent girls ages 12-19. The school also holds karate and self-defense workshops for rape awareness in the dorms.

"We don't turn anyone away for lack of funds, in fact we are arranging a financial aid policy to make (classes) equitable for everyone interested," Holt said.

"Those interested are welcome to make an appointment to watch a class before they decide to enroll in a program," she said.

For more information on workshops and classes, you can contact Beth Holt or Janet Alss at 1-527-0101.

A group for ALANA women

A group for women of African, Asian, Latina and Native American descent is in the process of being formed.

The group can be a social or political support group. It can be a place to do poetry readings. Or it could try to get a journal or newsletter published.

There is no set focus or definition for this group at this time. Anyone who is interested should bring any ideas to the next meeting which will be held on Monday, October 22 at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center. Check the Campus Center listings at the Information desk in the Campus Center for the room number.

For more information contact Kim Han, Sharon Park or Loyda Guzman.

Just a lot of talk

As Co-editor of this page, I sometimes wonder if most people on this campus really could care less about "women's issues." Maybe most women of this campus do not see the need to address concerns affecting them.

Why do we need a Women's Issues page? What are we trying to prove, that we are special or something?

Minu Sebastian

Maybe women and men are all the same. We all live in the same world so we probably all experience life the same way.

What's the big deal? Maybe we should lighten up and go with the flow. Anyways there's classes, grades, a part-time job and all these other things that we would be better off concentrating on.

Maybe equality means to demand the same rights as men, to be able to share in the positions that they dominate. Maybe then we should just concentrate on taking our business courses, enrolling ourselves in the armed forces and running for political office.

Power, that's the name of the game. We need to have power. The only way to get it then must be to be just as competitive, active and productive citizens as men are.

And what's the deal about "women of color and Third World women?" Who are they and where are they? Women are women, who cares what color they are.

Writing is such a time-consuming activity. Anyway who knows how to write? Writing is for people who have something radical to say.

If you can relate to anything I have said so far or if you are confused about why I have said these things, please continue reading.

I have just written what I consider to be the dominant mentality of the women of this campus. How have I come to these insightful conclusions?

There are two women's issues editors this semester, and between us we have about two people who consistently are willing to write. That means that out of about twenty-five thousand students (of whom a significant number are women) four women are making a contribution to this page.

So that leaves the question open to who actually reads this page. And if no one is reading, then why the hell am I writing this column?

For the past few weeks I have been basically talking to myself. I am convinced that no one is listening. My position was created especially to reach out to "women of color" and Third World women. It was created to establish a voice for women whose views have not been represented.

So far there has been no inquiry into the position created or any submissions or any interest in general. Most of the talk I have heard about "women of color" needing to express their point of view and "women of color" needing representation is just talk.

When it comes down to it there are only a few people who have any "real" commitment to issues of "women of color."

My position was established on the premise that there are some who consider their experience as a woman unique and in need of discussion.

Just more talk, I guess.

On Call: Political Essays
June Jordan
South End Press

Recalling the 1980s, many of us might well repeat Charles Dickens' opening lines from his book, A Tale of Two Cities: "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times."

While greed and callousness swept the land like some infernal plague, a bellicose U.S. foreign policy took a frightful toll on Nicaragua, Grenada, El Salvador, Guatemala and South Africa. Like some suave con man, Ronald Reagan reaffirmed the electorate's faltering belief in America while the human costs of this dumbshow were averted. Yet judging by the 18 essays in On Call, Black poet June Jordan was not taken in. In fact, her essays burn like an incandescent testimony to the flame of conscience.

While the nation seemingly rejoiced in its collective decision to somnambulate, June Jordan remained awake. Her testimony reveals the best the human spirit is capable of. Like Virgil in Dante's Inferno, she serves as a guide to our hell.

From the very introduction, the author exposes the silent McCarthyism that she confronts in daring to speak as a Black woman and a radical. The established mythology of literary freedom is pierced — the myth that "freedoms of speech and of the press remain questions that basically apply only to faraway writers."

Increasingly, she admits that as she became better known, paradoxically she found it harder to get published. This she pithily terms, "the politics of our exclusion."

Jordan's opening essay identifies Walt Whitman as the unacknowledged genius of American poetry and explore how he has been sanitized and domesticated by an elitist literary establishment that equates the accessible with the inferior in poetry, the politicized with the profane. Yet in a Whitmanesque burst of prose, she exalts the New World poets around her, heirs to a poetry "as personal, as public, as irresistible, as quick, as necessary, as unprecedented . . . as an emergency phone call."

BOOK REVIEW

Yet despite the majestic potential of poetry, she names the Eurocentric baggage that limits us. In naked prose she observes, "We erase ourselves through self-hatred." Overall, though this essay embodies a rare fluency with literature and politics; her target is not merely stultifying poetry but the literary "Thought Police" who would constrict the spontaneous breakthroughs of the Muse in each of us. Perhaps someone should send Senator Jesse Helms a copy of this essay.

The essay, "Problems of Language in a Democratic State" could serve as the political equivalent of the "Facts of Life" for anyone reared in the predigested comfort of American affluence. Writing from her own people's experience, she calls government "this diseased idea of the state." And in what might be a succinct overview of the Reagan era (and most of U.S. history for that matter), she notes, "Most Americans have sought to identify themselves with the powerful interests that oppress poor and minority peoples, perhaps hoping to keep themselves on the shooting side of the target range." In June Jordan's riveting prose, the highest (and mostly concealed) truths of political science and U.S. foreign policy are unmasked. She alerts the haves too, that, "If you get fired or if you get sick tomorrow, you might as well be Black, for all the state will want to hear from you."

Even education — or what passes as education — is seen through. In our era of heightened concern about our schools, Jordan forces us to gaze into the mirror of our hollowness. In the most prophetic voice she asks, "Who has ever wanted White children to see their own faces, clearly, to hear their own voices, clearly?"

To both Blacks and Whites, she decries the levelling effects of the schools and writes, "Not too many people wanted to grant that maybe schools really are political institutions teaching power to the powerful and something unpalatable and self-destructive to the weak."

To all of us, June Jordan offers the way to freedom — the truth. It stands very close in On Call.

Funk, sarcasm pervade Velvet Monkeys release

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Rake
Velvet Monkeys
Rough Trade

Before you say you don't know who the Velvet Monkeys are, think again. Chances are you do, but you may not have known that they played together. Don Flemming and Jay Spiegel of ex-B.A.L.L and Bongwater Fame, Thurston Moore of Sonic Youth, and local superscum/bubble gum pop guitar whizz J. Mascis from Dinosaur Jr. all invented the Velvet Monkeys a couple of years ago. These guys are out of their trees. Put them in New York's Lower East Side's Fun City Studio, give them guitars and other things to play with, and the result is a record so mangled and psychotic it almost mugs you where you're sitting. The guitar abuse is better than anything Peter Pain ever attempted.

Jay, J. and Thurston are heavily on this. "Let's put as many guitar noise background tracks as possible" trip. Yeah, there's chord melodies and bass, but the thunderstorm of distortion is loud, fast and stupid. Speaking of stupid, there's also lots of super fun, dumb lyrics, especially on "Love to Give," which makes no sense whatsoever: "Give to you love to give to you/I have one desire for you love sing for you," and so on.

These guys couldn't be shootin' for sarcasm could they? Even the cover suggests they're just oh so into it. The entire thing is a Superfly rip off: a guy in a bad-ass pose holding a gun, legs spread to show off the bulge, standing in between two women lying on the floor pretending to look seductive and voluptuous. The pictures on the back cover emulate it to a T.

The music even has that same horribly charred feeling of people looking for cheap apartments. Artsy, unserious, New York White boys toasted on T.V. and cheesy 70s imagery and decor.

"I said the Velvet Monkeys are commin' to town/ when the Velvet Monkeys come every body gets down." And don't forget to duck! Trying to sell themselves like mall material, they come off as if they were the "latest craze." Movies, T.V., venetian blinds, violence, and great character names: Thurston as "Mr. Pussy," J. as "Sweet Dick" and others including the infamous "Miss Sugarbowl." This is the star attraction. Such innovation, such joy, such beauty from such dumb Americans.

Rake is just peachy keen and neato. Anyone who hates their roommates that much will find this platter a viable antidote. They're just so commercial and silly, that even the morally lobotomized will enjoy being cast into the throes of teflon thrash. Yeah! Go Team! This sure is one funny as funk record!

Suicidal Tendencies spew great success with their new Lights, Camera, Revolution

By DANIELLE DOWLING
Collegian Staff

Sometimes, it's not what you say, it's how you say it.

Take for instance, the phrase, "I love you." Now, if it you say it to someone you love in a warm, cuddly way, more than likely you will receive an affectionate response.

However, if you grunt it out in demonic growls while spewing green puke, you will probably freak out your loved ones.

Suicidal Tendencies will not spew green puke. However, you can't help but love their wise-ass tidbits of wisdom offered on their latest release Lights, Camera, Revolution.

While the subject matter covered in the lyrics is not ripe with startling insight, their delivery of the material is definitely worth a listen.

For example, you can't help but like the lyrics to "You Can't Bring Me Down:" "Before you go walking in my world/you better take a look at the real world/Cause this ain't no Mister Roger's Neighborhood/Can you say 'feel like shit?'/Yea maybe sometimes I do feel like shit /I ain't happy about it, but I'd rather feel like shit than be full of shit/And if I offended you, oh I'm sorry/But maybe you need to be offended."

RECORD REVIEW

Telling censors and the Parents Music Resource Center where to stick it is not a new topic. In fact, it's kind of cliche. But Suicidal just has this way of getting their point across.

Musically, this album is standard Suicidal. There's nothing particularly fancy, just straightforward raw energy channeled into some kind of coherent noise.

"You Can't Bring Me Down" and "Disco's Out Murder's In" are nasty adrenalin pumpers, while "Lovely" has a cool groove to it.

My pick off of the album would have to be "Send Me Your Money." It has a catchy chorus mixed in with an excellent rhythm and served up with enough energy to bounce a cannonball off a cement block. The lyrics cover another used topic — corrupt church leaders.

But to reiterate, they just know how to say it: "We'll take credit cards, we'll take jewelery/We'll take your momma's dentures if they got gold in them."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

Aries (March 21-April 19): Avoid taking chances where your savings are concerned; keep your money where you know it is safe. Luck enters the romantic picture through a social introduction.

Taurus (April 20-May 20): Travel may be part of your plans; financial pressures should be off for a while. Discoveries made through a reading and conversation set an important matter straight.

Gemini (May 21-June 20): Your mate or partner realizes your true feelings now. Better communication will ease your financial concerns. News about a festive occasion strikes a pleasant note. Be more outgoing.

Cancer (June 21-July 22): A minor change at work will increase your responsibilities. Greater financial rewards are in the offing. Teamwork is favored. Luck and good timing will improve a romantic situation.

Leo (July 23-Aug 22): Share your dreams and goals; others are willing to help you! You may feel especially vulnerable or nostalgic later today. Plan a relaxing evening at home. Romance flourishes on consideration.

Virgo (Aug 23-Sept 22): Although your associates may not agree with all your ideas, they are supportive. Teamwork will boost profits. An influential person is impressed by your talents. A raise or new position is possible.

Libra (Sept 23-Oct 22): A surprise gift could change your whole outlook today. Romance will be especially happy for someone who has been feeling left out. Focus your attention on family matters.

Scorpio (Oct 23-Nov 21): Your workload may lighten now. Find time for amusement and romance. Adopt a more nurturing approach to your co-workers. A young person you know would make a good mother's helper.

Sagittarius (Nov 22-Dec21): A change of scenery is advised. If out door activities beckon you, try to finish your work early. Happily, your powers of concentration are at a peak. Admiring glances will come your way!

Capricorn (Dec 22-Jan 19): A great day for finalizing business negotiations. Those who have taken certain positive steps will soon see their incomes rise. Your wish for better family reations is coming true.

Aquarius (Jan 20-Feb 18): Someone's dissatisfaction or supercritical perfectionism could upset your applecart. Realize that this person's discontent has very little to do with you. A new haircut will lift your spirits.

Pisces (Feb 19-March 20): A truly fulfilling day unfolds. If you put your charms to work you could add some excitement to your life. A co-worker is interested in you; take a walk on the wild side! Plan a secret rendezvous.

Lacrosse successful at Army

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

In spring sports action, the lacrosse team travelled to West Point, NY and brought home two victories. The Gorillas were successful in two of three attempts, their wins were against C.W. Post (10-8) and Stonybrook College (9-8). Their only loss was against Army (6-4), who as of this year, dropped UMass from their schedule. Post and Stonybrook are Division III competitors not seen on the spring schedule.

"Overall, I'm pleased at this stage in the season," Garber said. The team took advantage of this trip to expose freshman as well as re-acclimate the veterans to outside competitors.

According to Garber, rain poured on Friday and before the first face off on Saturday. The clouds cleared and the air became humid. The best way to describe the play was the Mud Bowl.

The Gorillas started their veterans at midfield while the less experienced players started at attack and defense. Garber said he substituted freely, in order to "give every one a fair shake." Conversely, the other teams kept their starters in and minimized subbing. Garber said he was keeping an eye on the change ups and was suprised more substitutions were not made.

"Both teams were eager to play," he said of the Army game. "They scored on man-ups and garbage goals."

Stonybrook played a zone defense because they could not keep up with UMass, Garber said. He also cited that all teams went into competition cold, without scouting reports which help to prepare teams for their competition.

"The freshman were nervous, which is understandable," Garber said. "They tended to hold back." He added that the veterans performed well. UMass was successful with face off possession and ground balls, which Garber said was a good sign. Tactically, he said they were not that spectacular.

"We definitely have to get in better shape," he said. "A certain part of our game deteriorated because of that."

Next Sunday, the lacrosse team will head to the Islands [Long, Staten and Manhattan] — do not blame the writer, it is the coach's attempt at humor. They face Hofstra University, Maryland-Loyola and Rutgers in other pre-season action.

Men's x-c takes 4th at Easterns

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

Battling a steady rain mixed with an occasional downpour, the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team finished fourth in the Eastern Conference Championship meet in New Britain, Conn. Saturday. UMass coach Ken O'Brien was pleased with his team's performance.

"I felt as though we would be in the top five in the meet," he said. "Possibly third or fourth with an outstanding performance or two."

Senior Joe Milette led the way for the Minutemen with a second place finish overall with a time of 26:44 over the five-mile course. He was barely nipped at the line by Vermont's Knut Nystad, who won the race in 26:43.

Milette was followed by sophomores Mike Davis, in 12th place and Pat Reed, in 18th place. O'Brien said he was especially pleased with the performance of his top three runners.

"I was very pleased with the way those three ran under extremely adverse conditions," O'Brien said. "They reacted very well to the weather and the championship caliber competition."

Sophomore Matt Simon and junior Pat Ryan rounded out the top five places for UMass, finishing 30th and 39th, respectively.

Vermont won the meet with 32 points. Southern Connecticut finished second with 72 points and the University of Lowell finished third with 83 points. UMass followed with 101 points to barely finish ahead of Maine, who finished fifth with 102 points.

O'Brien said he kept several of his top runners out of Saturday's race in order to rest them for the upcoming Atlantic 10 Championship meet.

He said he has seen "real progress" in the team in the last three weeks. He expressed optimism in his team's ability to compete in the A-10s on Oct. 20.

"I think [Milette, Davis and Reed] along with the runners who we kept out on Saturday should perform very well in the A-10s," O'Brien said. "We're closing the gap quickly with teams that were ahead of us earlier in the season."

Keys for a win for Oakland tonight will be for Dave Stewart (the master of the stare), 22-11 during the year and 2-0 in the playoffs, to pitch around hot hitters like O'Neil and Hal Morris, who hit .417 in the NLCS. Oakland will also need the bats of Canseco and McGwire, who combined for 76 dingers this season, but have come up empty so far in the playoffs.

The Reds will need starter Jose Rijo to have a big game on the hill. Rijo had a 4.38 ERA aainst Pittsburgh, a team that hit only .194 in the playoffs. Furthermore, the Reds need players like Davis and Sabo to wake up. Cincinnati cannot expect the A's to hit under .200 like the Pirates.

As stated before, the smart bet is with Oakland. The Reds, however, are nothing like the hapless Red Sox. They are together as a team and manager Lou Piniella knows how to make them win. I also have a strong feeling that Jose Canseco will lie down like the $5 million dog he is, and the 'Nasty Boys' will throw so many 95² fastballs that the A's will wish they were back in Beantown.

Perhaps I am going too far out on a limb here. Jose will probably crack four or five taters and the Reds' bullpen will come out throwing curves that don't curve and 70- fastballs. Stewart and Welch will throw no-hitters and Ricky Henderson will steal home but my prediction will remain as follows: Reds in 6 (for reasons only my psychiatrist can figure out).

Hoop coach promotes Midnight Madness

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The Cage was brimming with student bodies. Sounds of Ice-T, De La Soul and Dee Lite wafted through the rafters. The noise level was as high as the excitement level.

To say the least, it made for an exhilarating experience.

Showcasing the UMass talent pool, men's basketball head coach John Calipari and WWLP-TV sports anchor Rich Tettemer entertained and amused a throng of more than 3,000 hoop fans on Oct. 15, the first official day for basketball practice, as regulated by the NCAA.

For the second year in a row, gift certificates from local pubs as well as airfare to Florida proved to be ample enticement for the student body to await raffle ticket winners.

With a countdown reminiscent of New Years Eve, the 1990-91 team was introduced UNLV-style, complete with blackout and roving spotlight. The noise of the crowd lifted the roof off its hinges.

When the lights came up the team then took turns shooting and dunking, proving the pliancy of a basketball hoop.

Calipari then took the microphone and center court, thanking and encouraging the student support.

"It's important to get the students involved," Calipari said. "The fundraising for the team is done outside of the university. The Court Club donated over $300 and found sponsors [for the gift certificates awarded]."

Calipari briefly mentioned Sports Information Director Howie Davis' heart surgery as well as the comatose status of former UMass hoopster Lorenzo Sutton following a hit-and-run accident. Last month, Sutton was struck by a car on university grounds and remains at Baystate Medical Center in critical condition. Calipari asked for a moment of silence for Sutton and Davis.

The slam dunk contest was initiated as the team consecutively slammed six balls down the throat of the net. An airborne Will Herndon dunked seven consecutive times, often taking flight from the foul line. His fan club made themselves visible as well as audible.

Unfortunately, as the intrasquad scrimmage began, the crowd petered. The team demonstrated some serious hang time and were substituted often, allowing each player some limelight within the 10 minutes.

"I come from the Midwest where basketball is intense," said the 7-foot-2 freshman from Wausau, Wisc. "[Calipari's] intensity really attracted me here," Jeff Meyer said. "My parents were hesitant at first, but I made my decision to come here."

Veteran John Tate said he was optimistic about the upcoming season. "We're looking to come out hard this year," Tate said. "Talent-wise, we're ready."

This year's crowd was almost twice as large as last year's, a year which saw the re-birth of UMass as a basketball school. It was a year that witnessed a NIT berth, an Atlantic 10 Conference tournament showing built by a 17-14 record, the winningest record seen by the university in about a decade.

WHMP-FM carried the event live as Tettemer began the unofficial events, emceeing the intramural three-on-three finals. The three-on-three contests, both men's and women's teams, were won by Doug Greer, Mike Edwards and James Callahan as well as Jen Edwards, Terry Macormick and Nicole Montiero.

Seth Kaplan decided the free-throw contest. Those with painted faces were the first to get an opportunity at cash for successful shots. The women of the group swished the net more often than the men.

She knows it's way past her bedtime, yet Erin Calipari grins for the camera, sidetracked from watching her father John conduct Midnight Madness in the Cage Sunday.

Volleyball goes to Connecticut, hopes to improve

When you're down, things can only get better. It stands to reason, not every team can be on top all of the time.

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team now posts a non-impressive record of 3-16 and this can only mean one thing — transition.

The Minutewomen are predominantly freshmen and sophomores, so nervousness is expected said coach Carol Ford.

"Some of the [younger] players get rattled easy and their confidence gets down," she said. "They're not playing up to their potential."

Looking back to their last victory, against Holy Cross, Ford said she did not think the team played well. She said they have hit a steady lull in their season.

"We had been improving in all our matches, but in the last couple we seem to have been at a plateau," Ford said.

Away tonight at 8 p.m. against Connecticut (9-16), the team is looking to play better than they have in their last few games, according to Ford.

"We're hoping to play up to our potential and we're looking to get off of this plateau," she said.

Field hockey hosts Springfield today

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Two weeks ago, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team was preparing for its toughest part of the season. UMass faced Old Dominion, Northeastern, St. Joseph's, Temple, New Hampshire and Penn State. That part of the season is over, and now it's smooth sailing until the Atlantic 10 tournament.

UMass entered those six games ranked No. 8 in the nation. Two weeks later, the Minutewomen stand a chance of upping their ranking, and at worst holding eighth. That is the good news.

In those six games, the only easy win was against St. Joe's (4-0). The other five teams were all nationally ranked. ODU and Penn State were each ranked No. 2 when UMass faced them. Northeastern was No. 4, Temple No. 7, and UNH No. 14.

The Minutewomen finished 3-3 in those six games, and with any luck at all the result could easily have been 5-1.

UMass should have defeated Northeastern, but lost 1-0. At this point in the year, that was the best 70 minutes of field hockey they have played. They lost to Temple 3-2, and the general feeling is that they should have won that game too. But they didn't, and must now agonize over what could have been. That is the bad news.

Imagine, if UMass beats Temple and NU, they are either the second or third ranked team in the country. UMass would have an 11-2 record, instead of their 9-4 mark.

It's hard to say where UMass stands in comparison to the other top teams in the country. The Minutewomen are 2-3 against teams in the top 10, and one of those wins was against a Providence team which may just be moving back into the top 10 this week.

It seems that there is a significant gap between the top two teams (Old Dominion and North Carolina) and everyone else. UNC has beaten ODU twice, 3-2 (Sept. 22) and 2-1 (Oct. 13). But the Tarheels have lost two games, to Providence (4-2) and Maryland (3-2).

Midfielder Sherlan Cabralis and the field hockey team will bring Springfield College to the line today at 3 p.m. on Totman Field.

Sports Analysis

After seeing ODU play, they look like the team to beat. However, UNC is the defending champ and seems to have the formula to beating ODU. Their 12-2 mark will boost them back up to No. 1, this week, right ahead of ODU.

After the top two teams, it's safe to say that you can put numbers three through 10 in a hat, pick them out in any order, and it really won't matter. There has been so much flip-flopping amongst the top 10 teams that it's almost not worth ranking them until the end of the year.

For now UMass stands 11th until today when the rankings come out and they move up into the top 10. The Minutewomen host No. 20 Springfield College today at 3 p.m. on Totman Field. The Chiefs just recently moved into the top 20, and are playing their best field hockey of the season.

Expect Philippa Scott in net, and hope UMass does not suffer a let down.

World Series could prove to be Red hot

Well, the Pirates' big guns, Bonds, Bonilla and Van Slyke, ran out of ammunition, and the Red Sox laid down and died, leaving Cincinnati and Oakland to battle for the World Series title starting tonight in Cincinnati.

The smart money would, of course, be on Oakland to sweep (odds on a sweep are 7-2) or at least defeat the Reds. But it's the long shots that pay the bills and the Reds may have the team that will shock everybody this year.

Dave Szpila

Sure Oakland has the hitting, the starting pitching and the 'Eck,' Dennis Eckersly, coming out of the bullpen. So they have eight former All-Star selections in McGwire, Randolph, Lansford, Canseco, R. Henderson, Steinbach, McGee and Baines, a former Rookie-of-the-Year in Weis, and this year's front-runner for the Cy Young award in Welch, but do they have what it takes as a team to bring them their second World Championship in as many years?

Well, probably. They are a machine, an army of super athletes who know their goal, winning, better than any other team in the league.

The Reds have their share of stars as well, and they have been getting some clutch hitting from their bench. Eric Davis and Chris Sabo both struggled during the series against Pittsburgh, going 4-for-23 and 5-for-22 respectively, but other teammates picked up the slack. Paul O'Neil hit .471 with four RBI and pinch hitter Luis Quinones had the series winning hit last Friday in Game 6. The Reds are a solid unit at the plate, but their true strength lies in the bullpen. The 'Nasty Boys,' Rob Dibble, Randy Myers and Norm Charlton, are the toughest to face, besides Oakland's Eckersley, when they are given the lead. Dibble and Myers, who recorded 17 strikeouts between them in 10 and 2/3rds innings were voted Co-MVPs of the NLCS.

Women's soccer battles fatigue, faces well-rested Harvard

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

There is no rest for the weary.

Especially when speaking in reference to the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team.

Today at 3:30 p.m. the Reds face Harvard after a demanding weekend against Hartford (1-1) and Brown (2-1 OT). The Crimson are coming off five days of rest.

"They're pretty young," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "They've got a decent side. Their score against Cornell was unbelievable."

Harvard's 4-4-1 squad ended its first two games in overtime against Providence (2-1) and New Hampshire (2-2). Their other losses have all been shutouts against Stanford (4-0), Brown (4-0) and Connecticut (1-0). The Crimson have shutout Boston College (3-0), Cornell (4-0) and Holy Cross (3-0), San Francisco (3-1) being their other win.

"We expect another grind," Rudy said of the competition today. "I anticipate a good game."

Rudy cited some quality Crimson players including Robin Johnston, Tracy Hackeling, Laura Flynn and Tara Weinstock. He said Weinstock was good at marking up her opponents, whereas Flynn was good at attacking the midfield.

Hackeling has three goals under her belt, and teammates Flynn and Tory Fair each have two goals and one assist.

"She has a great shot," Rudy said of Johnston, who leads the team with three goals and three assists. "She's dangerous with the one-on-one."

Rudy also cited Harvard's key goal keeper, Beth Reilly, as a dangerous player. [She is the cousin of UMass' Diana Reilly.] In six games — three of which were shutouts, Reilly has compiled 55 saves with a save percentage of 0.85. She has 10 goals against with a percentage of 1.54 per game.

Rudy On the NCAA Finals: So many teams are factoring right now for the playoffs.

In Western competition six teams are vying for the top 12 . . . four in the Midwest . . . three in the South that are locked up . . . one sure shot in the Northeast with three others with long shots.

In the Northeast, results against common opponents between Brown, UConn, Hartford and UMass will be big factors in deciding the polls.

When the polls are recast, it nullifies wins and losses . . . Right now, 23 teams are looking at 12 spots.

It's exciting, too — now I'm all nervous again.

Tri-captain April Kater has the most points of the women's soccer team and remains three away from breaking the school record of most career points. The Reds (6-4-2) host Harvard (4-4-1) today at 3:30 p.m. on the Hill. UMass climbed to No. 1 in the Northeast.

MCLU files suit vs. UM administrators

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Civil Liberties Union filed suit Monday against four University of Massachusetts at Boston administrators, including President-Chancellor Duffey, charging UMass-Boston with violating free speech and association.

Three Boston organizations, the Reproductive Rights Network, ACT UP/Boston, and the coalition for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights claim they were denied a meeting room on the campus because of "political and religious pressures."

According to the suit, the three organizations had planned two meetings to organize a demonstration against Roman Catholic Cardinal Bernard Law because of his policies on abortion rights, AIDS education in public schools, and gay and lesbian rights.

The demonstration was planned for a procession in which Law would be ordaining new Catholic priests.

The suit continues that the groups had followed standard procedures at the University's College of Public and Community Service and arranged through a faculty member to use a room at the University for two meetings.

In a statement released last June, Duffey said organizers from the groups did not follow proper procedure in securing a meeting place.

Also named in the suit are Sherry Penny, chancellor of UMass- Boston, Leverett Zompa, provost and Donald Babcock, assistant chancellor.

UMass-Boston police locked the doors of the Downtown Center at 5 p.m.. The meeting, scheduled for 7 p.m., was held on a public sidewalk outside the building.

Although the plaintiffs in the suit are not asking for monetary compensation, they are asking for are declaration that there was in fact a violation of their rights.

The plaintiffs state in the suit they are bringing the lawsuit to ensure that University officials "cease interfering with rights to free speech that are vital not only to the demonstrators, but also to faculty members, students and larger society."

Michael Galvin, a member of ACT UP/Boston said the doors were locked on the meeting because "people in power don't want us to express what we have to say."

"I think there is a deterioration of clarity between church and state," he said. "I wouldn't be surprised if there was some economical reprises for blocking the meeting."

Galvin said Professor Ann Whithorn had arranged to use the room for two planning meetings, one on Wednesday night and the second on Friday night before the Saturday demonstration.

Galvin said all the standard procedures were observed for reserving rooms and that the same groups had held a perfectly peaceful meeting the week before and had posed no threat to the security to the building.

Galvin added that the three organizations feel there was intervention on the part of the Catholic Church in blocking the meeting.

"Politics makes for dirty bed fellows, which makes the bed dirty, and I think the relationship between the state and the Archdioces has gotten out of hand — it's time to change the sheets," Galvin said.

Attorneys for the Catholic Church refused to comment on the accusations.

Duffey set to discuss budget with students

Ever want to ask President-Chancellor Duffey a question on the UMass budget? Are you wondering if the University is going to cut your program? Well, here's your chance to ask him.

Duffey will be holding an information session for students today at 4 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge concerning the current budget crisis affecting Massachusetts and the University.

This is the second in a series of public appearances by Duffey to faculty, students and parents addressing the budget crunch which has taken $16 million — or 11 percent — from the University since July.

At the Faculty Senate meeting last week, the administration announced a proposal to gradually reduce 10 programs and eliminate four others.

Duffey will meet with parents at 6 p.m. Oct. 22, at Framingham South High School on Flagg Drive.

Baker rejects concessions to Iraq

By ANDREA HAMILTON
The Associated Press

Mikhail S. Gorbachev yesterday dispatched a Soviet envoy to the West to seek a peaceful end to the Persian Gulf crisis, but Secretary of State James A. Baker III rejected concessions to Iraq in return for a pullout from Kuwait.

A Japanese plan to deploy soldiers overseas for the first time since World War II was introduced in Parliament yesterday. The chief Cabinet secretary, Misoji Gakamoto, said passage of the plan would help Japan "fulfill its responsibilities to maintain peace in the international society."

The United States and other nations have massed nearly 300,000 troops in the Persian Gulf region since Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on Aug. 2. The United Nations has imposed a land and sea embargo on Iraq.

"The Soviet leadership believes that if there is a smallest chance to settle the conflict peacefully that chance should be used to the ultimate," Gorbachev spokesman Vitaly Ignatenko said in Moscow.

The spokesman said the Soviet president dispatched Primakov because the gulf "situation is very tense and there is a danger of sliding toward military conflict."

In Washington, Baker yesterday rejected hints from Iraq that it might withdraw from Kuwait in exchange for keeping certain strategic islands, or other concessions.

"We are unwilling to engage in a search of partial solutions," Baker said at a news conference in which he again demanded the reversal of Iraq's invasion of its oil-rich gulf neighbor.

To bend Hussein's apparent interest in a partial settlement of the crisis would permit him "to claim benefits" from Iraq's "rape of Kuwait," Baker said.

Defense Secretary Richard Cheney said in London that Americans will remain in the region "as long as the Saudis want us . . . as long as it takes to get the job done.

"No one should underestimate our staying power," he said before leaving London yesterday for Moscow.

Reports have indicated Hussein might withdraw in return for some Kuwaiti territory along the Persian Gulf — tow islands and the Kuwaiti section of the Rumailah oil field that straddles the Iraq-Kuwait border. Hussein had accused the Kuwaitis of drawing more than their share of oil from the field.

Palestine Liberation Organization Chief Yassar Arafat has also said Hussein was showing flexibility regarding the occupation.

But Iraq said yesterday its position remained firm.

"We will not give it up even if we fight for it 1,000 years," said Al-Thawra, the newspaper of the ruling Arab Baath Socialist Party.

"This is our final decision, a decision that all Iraq defends and guards by 6 million fighters."

Students protest question three on Rt. 9

Student trustee says CLT damage would go beyond education

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

If you are driving to work today on Route 9, keep an eye out for public higher education students protesting the tax rollback ballot question three.

From Pittsfield to Boston, college students have organized to inform commuters from 8 a.m. to noon at most intersections of Route 9 of the impact the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition will have on public higher education if passed by voters on Nov. 6.

Ballot question number three calls for a state tax and fee rollback to 1988 levels. The rollback will reduce discretionary monies by 40 percent during the current budget year. Discretionary monies are used by legislators to fund public higher education, human services and bridges and roads.

"Route 9 is supposed to undergo major construction this year and if CLT passes, it's not going to happen" said Angus McQuilken, student trustee of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. "The damage that CLT will cause will go beyond public higher education."

Greg Rotatori, the Student Government Association president at Framingham State College, said the idea to coordinate the protest sprung from a union representative on his campus.

"The general public needs to realize the impact of CLT on public higher education," Rotatori said. "They need to be aware of the consequences of a yes vote."

The Board of Regents of Higher Education, the organization which manages and maintains higher education in Massachusetts, has estimated that the passage of question three would cut $126 million from public higher education state allocations this year.

The figure was deduced by applying the $1.2 billion in across-the-board cuts from state agencies on-line accounts. If question three passes, legislators will decide where to

Backers of CLT explain the facts of question three

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Students of public higher education have not adequately considered the positive long-term effect that tax rollback ballot question three would have on the state economy to insure future job opportunities if the question passes, according to a spokesperson for the Citizens for Limited Taxation.

"What we are trying to do with question three is to turn the state economy around by putting $1 billion back into the private sector which in the last year has lost 93,000 jobs," said Chip Faulkner.

"If CLT doesn't pass, where are [college students protesting question three] going to find jobs?"

The Citizens for Limited Taxation petition, question number three, is a referendum motion on the Nov. 6 election ballot to rollback state taxes and fees to 1988 levels. The passage of question three would cut $1.2 billion, about 40 percent, of state discretionary revenues.

Faulkner said by taking $1.2 billion from the state and putting it back into the private sector, more jobs will be created.

The Board of Regents of Higher Education, besides denouncing against the question this month, has estimated that out of a total revenue loss of $1.265 billion this fiscal year, public higher education's state allocations will be reduced by $126 million.

The regents based their assessment on the lowest estimate provided to them by the Massachusetts Tax payers Association. They assumed in their estimate that all discretionary cuts by the legislature prompted by the passage of question three would be across-the-board.

"The regents don't have the slightest idea of how the ballot question will affect the budget and what they are putting out is conjecture," he said. "We like to call the tactics they are using 'the 3-D movie'—Devastation, Destruction and Disaster."

A statewide student coalition of public higher education picketed in Boston both the CLT headquarters and the office of the High Technology Council of Massachusetts, a financial backer of the petition. The students protested the impact that question three would have on public higher education, which they said would cause drastic tuition hikes and program reductions.

Student leaders said at the protest that tuition hikes caused by question three would make higher education unaffordable to the lower and middle classes. They added that if education is inaccessible to many people, the state economy will suffer from a lack of an educated and skilled workforce.

Faulkner said the staff of the CLT headquarter "had a big laugh" over the protest because they had heard that it was going to be a "massive protest," but only counted 39 students.

"My question is why weren't [the student picketers] in class?" he said. "This was during a weekday during class hours."

The petition, as written, will not rollback any public higher education tuition or fee increases, he said. Since at the time the petition was drafted two years ago Massachusetts was the second highest state nationally for public higher education subsidies, he said tuition and fees for state colleges and universities were not included.

"We're cutting 8 percent from a bloated, mismanaged state budget," Faulkner said. "The ballot question does not say to roll back anything in public higher education.

"We ask students protesting the question to look at long-term effects on the economy and not the short-term, like tuition and fees," he said. "Right now, it's a very tough job market."

Gay group reaches out to ALANA

By SEAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Correspondent

A rap group for gay, lesbian, and bisexual minority students has recently formed as part of the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance (LBGA).

The Diversity Group had its first meeting Monday. Students discussed the unique nature of being both gay and a member of a minority, their potential goals, and strategies for increasing awareness.

"I think it's a positive start — it's definitely a step in the right direction," noted one attendee. "I hope we can get more students involved."

Last spring, when the LBGA revamped the structure of its governing body, the Diversity Outreach Committee was created. Its purpose was to address issues pertinent to students of various ethnic and cultural backgrounds.

As a project of that committee, the Diversity Group was created to encourage a more supportive atmosphere for lesbian, bisexual, and gay minority students and to work on making the LBGA more inclusive.

According to Joe Loa, one of the group's organizers, "Individual minority students who have attended LBGA events have expressed feeling isolated or unsupported in the past. This group would allow students to meet each other, talk about their issues, and gain support."

The Diversity Group meets every Monday at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center. Room numbers are available at the information desk on the daily activities schedule. For more information, contact the LBGA office at 545-0154.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Expensive education seems cheap compared to alternative

Massachusetts has an attitude problem.

There are too many people here who think that college is a waste of time or money. Education is a wonderful thing, as long as someone else pays for it. They are tired of paying for a bunch of deadbeat students who could have paid their own way if they only worked hard enough.

I want to remind you of something. Most college students don't have the experience, or the chance, to save up enough money for college. You can save up a decent chunk, to be sure. But a part-time job flipping burgers, selling groceries or stocking shelves is not going to pay for four years of college.

Saying that we could have saved the money ourselves is ludicrous. Saying we could pay for our education by working through college is just as insane. It helps, but we also have classes to go to. You know, those things we are paying the money to go to in the first place.

Joe Duffey thinks that parents who can pay for their children's education should. I agree. He also said that children should sue parents who could pay for their education, but won't. How would a student pay for the lawsuit? And who is willing to sue their parents, no matter how tightfisted they may seem to be?

When I asked Joe Duffey if he thought parents should put their home up for a second mortgage, he said yes. "To take a second mortgage, to reduce the scale of your car, to give up the vacation" are all viable options for parents to take for their children. The problem is many people work hard to own their home. It is not a luxury, like a Cadillac or an annual trip to the Bahamas. If it were my parents, I doubt I'd be willing to take away what could be their nest egg to finance my education.

Pamela McCarthy

The rabid, angry mob that is known as the citizens of Massachusetts yell about high taxes. They think the way to right this horrendous wrongdoing is to slash all unnecessary spending. That would be fine, except that higher education has been deemed unnecessary. "State schools are a free ride for you; they are paid for by our tax money," they lament.

Guess what. I pay taxes, too. I pay tuition. I pay the fees. Nothing is free — I recognize that. So when tuition and fees went up, and classes, professors, supplies and services went down, I felt ripped off. Perhaps my tax money was better spent elsewhere, like Billy Bulger's fund for his miniature kingdom of South Boston, or the new clock in the statehouse, or the long, hard, three-hour days of Boston judges. How silly of me. An educated population is not important. How dare I think it is.

People will change their minds when they see that no one has the knowledge required to get a decent job. People will change their minds when their own kids have to deal with the mess. When it's not someone else's problem anymore.

What we need is not lawsuits or funding cuts. What we need is a serious change in attitude. Forgive me for sounding patronizing, but some people need to hear this again. Education is important. Having an ignorant, unskilled population is an ideal way to get this state in deeper trouble. There are only so many jobs open for people who flip hamburgers, stock shelves or sell groceries.

If we want an educated population, we have to pay. It's an investment, albeit an expensive one. Ideally, families should save money for college. But that's the ideal, and I'm not going to punish someone because their parents didn't save any money for college. I'm not going to ask them to sue their parents if their parents aren't willing to help them out. And I'm certainly not going to keep anyone who can't pay from going.

Education is expensive. Granted. But if you think education costs too much, think of the price you'll pay for the alternative.

Does Duffey expect us to sue parents?

In last Thursday's paper, President-Chancellor Duffey supported John Silber's proposal to raise the tuition at UMass by $5,000.

Duffey felt many students come from families that can absorb a tuition hike, and those who can't will receive financial aid and end up paying less tuition then they do now. I also support this plan because I feel it is fair to everyone.

Everyone that is, except the students (like myself), who for one reason or another pay their own tuition, and will be left with a tuition increase but no financial aid. Duffey suggests we take out parents to court and "make them take their responsibilities."

Does the Chancellor really expect me to sue my parents?

Once I turned 18, my parents no longer had responsibilities to give me anything, so I would probably lose the case anyway.

What really bothers me is Duffey's snobbish tone when he spoke of my parents. Just because my father makes too much money for financial aid and too little to sign a $12,000 check, does that make him a bad parent? I have a close relationship with my parents, one that I would not trade for any amount of money.

It is also a shame Duffey would rather see court action than come up with a plan to help self-paying students.

I figure many students are paying their own way have acquired some trade or service that makes them money. Maybe these trades (secretarial, painting, plumbing, etc.) could be useful to the University and help the students make good money while attending classes.

Maybe the highest-paying work-study jobs on campus could go to self-paying students and not just to students who need a little extra cash.

Maybe Duffey could come up with one level-minded suggestion to help us instead of having us start family court battles.

Chancellor, we do not want to sue our parents but we do want to go to college. We need opportunities, not lawsuits.

When cops are the bad guys: racism, politics and the police

Some Northern White folks tend to pride themselves in the notion that Northern racism is at least more subtle than its Southern counterpart. After all, we don't have any stereotypical tobacco-juice drooling, shotgun-toting maniacs that embody racism for some out-of-touch people. Northern cops aren't going to roust, kill or arrest someone because of their skin color. Right?

Jeremy Levinson

Wrong, says at least one UMass student.

Loyda Guzman is a Black Puerto Rican political activist. In fact, she was arrested about a year and a half ago for her political activities on campus. Since that arrest, she said she has settled the affair and obeyed both the law and University regulations.

During the past year Loyda has been accosted by campus cops four times. Last week while studying with friends in the Campus Center, she was seized, manhandled, handcuffed and dragged off by a half dozen White cops.

One of the cops involved had accosted her several months before. At the time no arrest was made. Now, the cop said, "You got away before; you're not getting away this time." According to Loyda, he made it real clear that he knew who she was.

Loyda wasn't read her rights until she was taken to the station. The cops say she wasn't "arrested" until she got to the station — she was merely cuffed and dragged away. At the police H.Q., they told her that she was arrested for trespassing.

During the time Loyda was arrested for her political activities, many non-student activists were banned from campus, subject to arrest if they returned. Loyda, a full-time student living in the dorms, was never banned. In fact, after being harassed by the cops twice, she had the administration send a letter to the cops telling them to back off.

After being told why she was arrested, they released her. The cops claim they mistook her for someone else. Apparently, the only similarity between Loyda and the woman they thought she was is the color of their skin. Maybe "Black" is enough of a description for the UMass police department.

Wait, there's more. The arresting officer made it clear that he knew who she was. This isn't surprising. She was one of the few Black activists arrested with their compadres way back when. Apparently this cop has a photographic memory for Black faces.

Was Loyda arrested because some cop remembered her Black face from scenes of political protest?

Or, was she mistaken for another Black woman? The truth is probably more complicated. What's clear is that some UMass cops make some decisions based on race and politics. And, the department is all too willing to slither away from its own racism.

Since her abduction, top cop Art Hilson has called Loyda and stopped by her dorm. One might speculate that he wants to do some quick damage control. Maybe he should spend that time contemplating his own department. Will there be an independent investigation? Will the administration live up to this obscene incident? Or will it be ignored like so many others?

Since and before a Black woman named Evette Henry won a huge sum as a result of racist false accusations of crimes by the University, we have known that the administration and their cops treat Black and White differently.

Whatever the specifics of Loyda's case turn out to be, UMass' problems with racism and the inability to tolerate political dissent are evident. Where the hell is the civility in that?

Loyda, for one, is fighting back. Not with picket signs this time, but with lawyers.

IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD — An unidentified couple takes a stroll through downtown Amherst.

Canadian task forces occupy Mohawk Reserve

Quebec's Public Security Minister Claude Ryan recently ordered the Canadian Army to pull out of the Mohawk Reserve in Kahnawake, Quebec and be replaced by the Surete de Quebec, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the military police.

These groups have formed an interdepartmental task force to patrol the highways of Kahnawake.

The Army released an official statement which said "that there was no longer any need for [the Army's] presence." The Army has been moved to St. Remi, about 15 minutes from Kahnawake.

Many Mohawks were furious when they learned that the Army had been replaced by other Canadian forces.

"The agreement was that when the military pulled out, we would maintain control of all highways and all local traffic," said Paul Deer, of the Mohawk Grand Council.

Grand Chief Joseph Norton said Ryan assured him police would not enter the village, but added, "We don't want them here at all."

Norton said Ryan ignored his previous request that the highways and roads in Kahnawake be patrolled by the native peacekeepers. During the past two weeks, the peacekeepers have attempted to double their force.

Tensions between the SQ and Mohawks date back to the 1950s, when the RCMP were stationed in town. In 1973, two SQ patrol cars were overturned and the force was chased out of town. In 1980, David Cross, a Mohawk native, was fatally shot by several SQ when he walked out of his house with a pool stick in his hand.

The most recent skirmish occurred in July, when the SQ raided a Mohawk barricade in Oka, Quebec, and fired tear gas and concussion grenades on unarmed Mohawks.

When asked about the possibility of further violence, Norton said, "I hope not but that's the SQ's decision."

Mulroney offers initiatives

Prime Minister to accelerate land claims

Editor's Note: This is one of several in a series of articles concerning Mohawk Natives in Quebec, Canada. Ric Oliveira is a Collegian staff member who is currently in Quebec.

On Friday in Ottawa, Canada, New Democratic Progressive Party leader Audrey McLaughlin said that "the Federal Government of Canada, is sending a message to natives that they will be ignored unless they take up arms."

Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney on Sept. 26 offered a series of initiatives to accelerate land claims, improve social and economic conditions, and delegate more power to native communities.

The Oka land claim is still in a vacuum, with the Canadian government issuing a statement that "it has no one group which it feels represents the Mohawk community to give it to," according to Thomas Sidden of the Indian Affairs Ministry.

McLaughlin told reporters last week the Canadian government pays a lot of attention to Aboriginal issues when something "spectacular" occurs in the crisis.

"The minute the crisis is over and there is nothing spectacular, it's not on the front page of the papers. The government forgets it as well," he said.

In response to his political opponent's attack, Mulroney said, "There was never any suggestion that we could solve overnight the very serious social conditions that have developed among Aboriginals.

"The only commitment I made was to introduce a fundamental change in attitude to bring about . . . social justice."

cut. Since CLT would go into effect on Dec. 6, the regents assumed legislators would cut across-the-board due to lack of planning time.

The regents also applied the $126 million cut as across-the-board cuts to universities, state and community colleges.

According to the regents' report, question three will cause the following cuts to the public higher education system:

- All public universities will lose $54,060,000 in total.
- All state colleges will lose $22,529,000 in total.
- All community colleges will lose $25,657,000 in total.

James Buckley, the SGA president of Fitchburg State College, said public higher education is "a prime suspect" when legislators are considering where to make discretionary cuts.

"Legislators will cut higher education since tuition can always be raised and students don't vote as much as they should," he said.

Freedom and Rain
June Tabor and the Oyster Band
Rykodisc

Freedom and Rain is difficult to pin down, and perhaps that's what June Tabor and the Oyster Band had in mind when they collaborated, since artists ordinarily strive not for labels but diversified uniqueness.

Sorry — no can do, as far as diversity is concerned.

Record Review

Tabor's alto voice is reminiscent of that in Clannad although sort of half-swallowed/half-bored. Instrumentation on the album is quick and Celtic, fiddle-ridden with mandolin and percussion steaming out at every turn.

"Night Comes In," an affable cover of a Richard Thompson song, lacks one thing and that is a voice that alters and changes — more alive than the seeming deadpan sound of Tabor. The mixture of Tabor and the Oysters by this point seems disparate, odd at best, but it has a saving grace and that is its occasional up-tempo, party-like possibilities.

"Mississippi," the first song I encountered is dark and intricate in lyric. It may be my affinity for Billy Bragg or maybe it's my loyalty leading me to an anti-cover stance, but intense fiddles do not belong in their cover of "Valentine's Day is Over," (from Bragg's Worker's Playtime) a ballad meant to glide along, not to agitate like a washing machine — though they seem to have fun with it.

It may be true that Tabor is a favorite British folk singer of Elvis Costello's and Natalie Merchant's, but generally, the album is an average one, not a great one.

Acts to grace AC Frontroom

The Campus Center Frontroom at Amherst College will be host to an interesting array of acts this semester.

This Friday at 8 p.m., Tom Deluca performs his hybrid mix of hypnosis, magic and comedy.

The price of admission for this show is $5 for the general public and $2 for students of Amherst College.

Mary Chapin Carpenter highlights the Frontroom's "Sunday at Eight" series this weekend. Voted Top New Female Vocalist at the 1990 Country Music Awards, her style incorporates elements of jazz, swing and rock as well as country. She's also got some great ballads like her single "This Shirt."

Tickets may be purchased in advance at the Amherst College Campus Center or at the door on Sunday at Buckley Recital Hall. The cost is $10 per ticket, or $3 for Amherst College students.

Alison Krauss and Union Station, a bluegrass/newgrass band, are slated on the "Sundays" series for Oct. 28.

Tickets can be purchased by the public for $7 and by Amherst students for $1.

Following this are folk musicians Gordon Bok, Ed Trickett and Ann Mayo Muir. There are three of them, but they insist that they are not a trio, at least not in the conventional sense.

To find out why, check them out on Nov 4, $7 for the public, $1 for Amherst College students.

Aside from the "Sundays at Eight" series, the Frontroom is also presenting two comedians, Sean Morey on Saturday, Oct. 27 at 9 p.m. and Bertice Berry on Saturday, Nov. 10, also at 9 p.m.

Vera proves exciting

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

There's a really famous club in Groningen, the Netherlands in this tiny city called Vera. It has to be one of the most exciting night spots in the whole of Europe. Vera has attracted some of the best bands from around the world, from the Dream Syndicate, to Gwar.

Anyhow, they've decided to release some of their greatest recordings and stick them on a record.

The result is Vera Groningen, a compilation put together by owners, and soundmen E. Heath, and Frank Van Donkersgoed. And I have to admit it's very good. The bands on it are for the most part different from each other. I thought I'd never live to see the day when Alex Chilton and the Nomads would end up on the same slab of vinyl together.

The Nomads, from Sweden, start off the platter with a loud bang. Frankly, until now, I had never heard of these guys. I'm embarrassed to say that, because they've since split up, and were one hell of a group. Their song "Real Gone Lover" has got the sort of hard biting edge and fuzz I like in a song.

Which is what I wish I could say for the Leaving Trains. "So Fucked Up" is a hogwash of a track, and the title of it says it all.

But "The Lung," by local nuts Dinosaur Jr., is really cool. I unfortunately never saw them do this one live and really didn't think they could pull it off. But it's incredibly well done. Sonic Youth are the masters of improvisational pieces. "Broken Eye" sounds like something they like to play in between songs.

Trying to get as many twisted sounds out of their distortion peddles and tube drivers as possible, Thurston and posse crank out deafening noise (watch your speakers — it's louder than you think) — the kind of the stuff you and your mates might play in your basement at 4 a.m., after a night of heavy tripping.

And speaking of tripping, Sylvia Juncosa must have gotten a hold of something mighty powerful. I don't know if I can describe what she does: imagine a subversive Romper Room scene put to music and you might come close. I've never heard of her and I'm looking forward to hearing more.

Record Review

The Dream Syndicate, one of my favorite bands of the early 80s, may not be as good as they were when they released their That's What You Always Say EP seven years ago, but this track, entitled, "50 In A 25 Zone" doesn't disappoint: stringy guitars and a plush sound, a harder version of the Feelies (who also appear on this compilation). The quality of their material, as usual, is nothing short of impressive.

Other bands who appear on this compilation, such as the Scientists, the Gun Club and on the CD, B.A.L.L., are also promising.

All in all it makes a good listen (even better, it's perfect with morning coffee); proof that when in Holland, head to Groningen (about two hours by train from Amsterdam) and check out Vera. Chances are someone you like will be playing there. And based on this record, you probably wont be disappointed.

NATIONAL COLLEGIATE ALCOHOL AWARENESS WEEK Oct. 17 ~ 23

YOUR WINNING BUMPER STICKER WILL STICK TO YOUR RIBS

Drunk driving kills young people. More than half of all fatal motor vehicle crashes involve alcohol.
That's where YOU come in. Design a bumper sticker to promote "Designated Driver" or "Don't Drink and Drive" themes. Your ideas can win you a great dinner at a local restaurant. And maybe you'll help save a life.

PRIZES:

1st Prize	$50 Gift Certificate for Beardsley's Restaurant
2nd Prize	$30 Gift Certificate for Fitzwilly's Restaurant
3rd Prize	$25 Gift Certificate for the North Star Seafood Bar and Restaurant
4th Prize	$20 Gift Certificate for the Depot Restaurant
5th Prize	$20 Gift Certificate for Spaghetti Freddy's Restaurant

Your sticker design should measure no more than 3 inches by 12 inches. Entries will be judged by the staff of the Northampton Saving Lives Program and the Five College Alcohol Awareness Project. Winning designs will be printed and distributed in Northampton and the Five College area.

Entries must be received by Friday, November 2nd. Please include your name, address and telephone number on the back of your entry. Winners will be notified in late November.

Send your entries to: Karen Jacobus

Alcohol and Drug Awareness Project 1990

It's Saturday night at the University of Massachusetts. Thousands of students engage in countless activities to help unwind their minds from the toils of a long work week. The majority of these young adults have something in common. No matter what their choice of activity, many will use alcohol. The addition of alcohol will also add the danger that alcohol usually brings with it. Before the night is over, someone is sure to be involved in an alcohol related incident. With 91% of the students at the University of Massachusetts using alcohol, 60% of them getting drunk at least once in the past month, the amount of alcohol related incidents is on the rise. You say this doesn't affect you?

Alcohol is a central nervous system depressant. It affects the brain by impairing judgement, sensory perception, coordination, and impulse control.

Alcohol kills! The number one killer for people under the age of 25 is traffic accidents. The majority of these accidents involve alcohol. Also, 4 out of 5 people who attempt suicide have been found to have been drinking alcohol prior to the attempt. 35-40% of all successful suicides are alcohol related. Still, you say this doesn't affect you?

Clearly one of the most frightening crimes of today's society is rape. The physical and psychological damages can take many years to heal. One type of rape that is being spoken about more today is acquaintance rape. 75% of men who commit acquaintance or "date rape" consume alcohol prior to the rape. 55% of women who are victims of acquaintance rape have also consumed alcohol prior to the incident. With so many students at college drinking, date rape has soared.

Alcohol is the drug of choice among college students. It has become an established recreational tool. Students forget that prior to college many of them were not using alcohol as much and still having a good time. Alcohol does not have to be synonymous with a good time.

This week is Five College Alcohol Awareness Week. All across the five college campus' events and displays will be taking place to help educate everyone about alcohol. The theme for the week will be, "Take a Risk...Have Fun Without Alcohol". Many of the activities taking place will challenge one to do just that. These suggestions will be as simple as:

Take a Risk,
...ask for a non-alcoholic drink
...have sex sober
...go to an alcohol education workshop

Plus many more, or you can think up some of your own. Adapt some of your favorite drinking games: Quarters, the King of Beer Games, can be played with plain cola. The quick ingestion of large quantities of carbonated soda will allow the loser of the Quarters game to become the victor in an immediate belching session that follows. If funneling is your shtick, why not funnel something like chicken soup or soggy mashed potatoes instead of beer? You'll still end up worshipping the porcelain god, but you'll avoid the nasty hangover that beer supplies. Whatever you choose to do, Take a Risk, and Have Fun Without Alcohol.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

Aries (March 21-April 19) Cultivate a take-charge mentality. Others are anxious to climb aboard your success wagon! Pace yourself at work today. Acting indifferent works wonders with a potential romantic partner.

Taurus (April 20-May 20) As systems are go for a work project. A new promotion could have you walking on air! You find yourself pensive even in the midst of friends. Charitable acts will attract lucky vibrations.

Gemini (May 21-June 20) Welcome a chance to launch a new business. Your income will soar in the near future. Your psychic ability may help you advise those closest to your heart. Be true to your values.

Cancer (June 21-July 22) You are open to original ideas now. Be willing to experiment. Travel will improve a current romantic relationship. Be alert when purchasing costly items. Check for flaws.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22) Steer clear of gossips or anyone who reveals secrets. Do not compare yourself to others; you are unique! Avoid conference calls at all costs.

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Excellent prospects are in store for a legal settlement or educational investment. Family will be forgiving if you admit a mistake. Get together with close friends. Romance holds new promise.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Try not to take offense at indirect/hurtful colleague. Solidify a business relationship by making a long-term commitment. A loved one may hold the trump card. Steer clear of new-tangled phone systems.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Reshuffle your priorities to accommodate your partner's needs. If an important function must be postponed or canceled, use the time to finish up old projects.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) Think about your public image and re-evaluate your career goals. A diet-and-exercise program may be necessary. Do not feel guilty about ending a relationship that is going nowhere.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Try to set aside more quality time for your family. When giving your home a face-lift, do not try to do everything at once. Encouraged a teenager to be more independent. Share secrets.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) To get what you want, promote yourself. Attempts to impress friends with your buying power could boomerang. Do not shirk your responsibilities. Schedule regular medical and dental appointments.

Pices (Feb. 19-March 20) Be more affectionate. Domestic matters will be easier to handle late in the day. Don't sow your wild oats just yet – put that security blanket aside for awhile. Romance will blossom in the workplace if you let it.

"We had our chances at the Northeastern and Temple games, those are the ones that are going to keep us out of the top four," she said.

As for the remainder of the season Hixon said, "We just have to keep on going. We're now in a good, solid position physically and mentally, and now I think with that Penn State win we've established ourselves nationally as being a contender."

The Minutewomen travel to Dartmouth on Thursday for a 3 p.m. matchup.

passes. Wilkos shared the award with UNH's Bourassa.

UMass inside linebacker Gregg Mattern, a redshirt freshman from Tuckerton, N.J., was named Yankee Conference and ECAC Rookie-of-the-Week. Mattern, starting in the linebacker spot vacated when Matt Tulley rebruised his shoulder in practice, recorded 13 tackles against UConn.

Tulley is listed as doubtful for Delaware.

Wilkos overtook Rhode Island's John Newson for the Yankee Conference rushing lead Saturday; Wilkos is averaging 96.2 yards per game, to Newson's 94.7. UMass tailback John Johnson is third at 84.8.

UMass is the top rushing team in the league, averaging 282 yards per game. Second-place New Hampshire averages 210.8 yards per game.

Cheers to the UMass Alumni Band, which spelled out VOTE NO ON 3 at halftime Saturday.

New Jersey legislator fuels locker room fray

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — Reacting to the recent national controversy over women sports writers in locker rooms, a New Jersey legislator proposed on Tuesday to prohibit all media interviews for 30 minutes after the conclusion of sporting events.

The legislation includes sports from the high school and college level to the four professional franchises that play in the state. It was introduced by Sen. John F. Russo, D-Ocean.

The National Football League and the New Jersey Press Association are gearing up to oppose the proposal. Russo, an avid sports fan who is friends with officials and players of the New York Giants, said Tuesday he decided to propose the 30-minute rule after nationally publicized incidents involving female sports writers in football locker rooms.

"Lisa Olsen made me think about the problem," Russo said, referring to the Boston Herald reporter who claimed she was harassed by members of the New England Patriots during an interview in the locker room.

"Something should have been done. We just can't allow things like New England and Sam Wyche to continue."

Wyche, the coach of the Cincinnati Bengals, was fined about $30,000 for banning women reporters from the locker room after a game in Seattle. Federal courts ruled in the 1970's that female writers must have equal access to locker rooms.

Russo said he believed it would be in the best interest of sports and journalism for players to be allowed "to cool off and take a shower" before giving postgame interviews.

The former Senate President said it was a preferable, more fair alternative that setting up separate interview rooms, as some have proposed.

Russo's bill runs counter to the current NFL policy. Jim Heffernan, public affairs director for the NFL, said the league policy is for equal access for all reporters to the players.

"Once the last player has entered the locker room, the doors should be opened within a reasonable amount of time, like five to seven minutes," Heffernan said.

Field hockey beats third straight top twenty team, 3-0

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team entered Tuesday's game at Totman Field as the new No. 8 ranked team in the nation after two convincing wins against No. 14 New Hampshire and No. 2 Penn State this past weekend.

However, UMass was hosting the new No. 16, formerly No. 20, ranked team in the nation, Springfield College.

Nonetheless, UMass proved it deserved its higher ranking by dominating Springfield, 3-0.

Senior forward Mara Frattasio started the scoring early as she squirted a loose ball, among confusion, past Springfield goalie Dawn Handlin at 30:55.

"We really needed to come out strong early on Springfield and get after them right away, which is what we did. That gave us a little breathing space," said UMass coach Pam Hixon.

Just over three minutes later, a corner taken by Frattasio was hit to junior Dawn Trumbauer, who shot on goal. Trumbauer's shot rolled up the arm of goalie Handlin and fell where senior Nancy Philbrick was waiting to knock it in for UMass' second goal.

"We played scared to start off and that put us behind 2-0," said Chiefs coach Dottie Potter Zenaty.

The Minutewomen used their crisp passing to control the ball in the opposing end for the remainder of the first half; UMass had eight shots on goal to Springfield's three.

Springfield began the second half with more aggressive play and managed to pressure the UMass defense, but whatever came close to the goal was denied by the Minutewomen backfielders or booted away by goalie Philippa Scott. Scott finished the day with seven saves.

Midway through the second half, Springfield's key player, Jennifer Kleva, had to leave the game with a sprained ankle.

"When our left midfielder got taken out of the game, that took the stuffings out of us," said Zenaty.

Springfield played listless and unorganized for the rest of the contest, and the Minutewomen took advantage. UMass' third goal came on a perfectly executed corner from Frattasio to Trumbauer who blasted it past Handlin with 3:55 to play.

UMass prevailed in all offensive categories. UMass had 13 corners to Springfield's 3, and took 16 shots to 7 for the Chiefs.

"I was a little nervous today, because sometimes after you have big wins like the New Hampshire, Penn State one-two punch there's a little bit of a let down," said Hixon.

"We were just happy to win, good, bad or ugly. Springfield is an up and coming team. It was important to have a good, solid win against them."

When asked about the new rankings that came out today, Hixon described them as "fair, legitimate. . . No. 8 is where we should be."

YanCon race takes shape

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Saturday's 38-19 win over Connecticut raised the University of Massachusetts football team to a tie atop the Yankee Conference. Both UMass and New Hampshire are 4-0.

The Minutemen continue to climb in the Div. 1-AA poll too; UMass is ranked No. 7 in the country this week.

UNH, ranked No. 5, beat non-conference Colgate Saturday 38-22, with back Barry Bourassa rushing for four touchdowns and 170 yards on 20 carries.

The Wildcats play Northeastern in another non-conference game this Saturday, while the Minutemen travel to Delaware to face the Fightin' Blue Hens, who are alone in second place in the conference at 3-1.

A UMass win would give the Minutemen the top spot in the Yankee Conference outright, regardless of how UNH fares against Northeastern. UMass has not beaten Delaware in 14 tries, dating back to 1958.

And if you've got your date book handy, the Minutemen will face UNH on the last weekend of the season, Saturday Nov. 17 in Durham.

Elsewhere, Around the Yankee Conference: Rhode Island, whom the Minutemen beat on a late field goal two-weeks back, dropped their third straight game, 24-17 to Maine.

The Black Bears, bolstered by the return of 270-pound guard Rob "Chubby" Noble, snapped a five-game losing streak. Maine had lost eight of nine over two seasons (dating back to an unlucky appearance in Sports Illustrated last October, if you believe in such things).

Boston University collected its second win of the season with a 28-14 defeat of Richmond. Terrier quarterback Stan Greene threw for 225 yards in the first half against a weak Spider secondary. UMass travels to Richmond Nov. 3.

The envelope please: UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos collected his second Yankee Conference Co-Offensive-Player-of-the-Week award of the season for his efforts against UConn.

Wilkos rushed for 143 yards and a touchdown and threw for 93 yards and two TD's in completing nine of 16

Reds fight fatigue in 3-1 win over Crimson

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

Fatigue is one of those sneaky factors that hits home around that 10 minute break at halftime.

Yesterday's play against Harvard was no exception as the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team held off an impressive second half rally to command a 3-1 win at Boyden's Hill.

Thanks in part to Harvard, UMass remains at the top of the Northeast Region poll and No. 10 in the nation with a 7-4-2 record, as Harvard drops to 4-5-1.

Action began quickly as sophomore Kim Eynard chipped in the first goal unassisted five minutes into the game.

With four minutes left in the half, a penalty was called outside the Crimson box. Harvard coach Tim Wheaton questioned the call in jest. Unfortunately for Wheaton, the referee did not take his comment seriously and senior April Kater took the penalty kick. Kater is just shy of breaking the school record for career points. Successful, she helped boost the Reds to a 2-0 edge where they stayed until halftime.

Then the fatigue set in.

UMass goalie Skye Eddy came up with big saves on Harvard breakaways in the first half. She was pulled at the half with a swollen left hand, finishing the game with four saves.

Freshman Briana Scurry stepped in to guard the net. The Crimson came out scrapping in the second half and actually possessed more play.

Harvard scrambled often in the box and caused UMass' defense and Scurry some grief. They were successful early in the second half when sophomore Sharon Olken connected with senior Tracy Hackeling on a corner kick. The ball rolled into the bottom left corner of the UMass net to annihilate the Reds' chance of a shutout.

"This was a classic UMass game," Wheaton said. "They showed us a hard, strong defense."

Harvard lashed out even harder but UMass' defense held them to only one goal.

"They don't stop," Rudy said of Harvard's style of play.

Slowly, UMass players came off the bench, an area of weakness for the Reds in earlier games, but yesterday, a source of needed strength.

Soon after Harvard answered, junior Tracy Arwood handled a pass from senior Robin Runstein and broke for the goal down the sideline. She successfully hit the back of the net with 14 minutes left in the game, her first goal of the season. Harvard failed to answer, as the game ended 3-1.

"I think that took some wind out of their sails," Rudy said of Arwood's goal. "Unfortunately, we lost our focus."

Rudy expressed displeasure in the team's effort, but allowed room for the fatigue factor.

Harvard goalie Beth Reilly comes up short on this April Kater penalty kick, which gave the women's soccer team a 2-0 lead over Harvard just before the half. The Reds went on to win 3-1, yesterday at Upper Boyden Field.

Rival UConn at Boyden atop Big East

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Last weekend one University of Massachusetts men's football team beat up on Connecticut. Today, the other UMass "football" side (every nation but the U.S. calls 'soccer' by it's proper name) hopes it can do the same.

The 2-8-3 Minutemen face their traditional rival from Storrs, Conn. this afternoon at 3 p.m., at Upper Boyden field. The Huskies, 7-7-3 and tied for first in the Big East, are ranked eighth in New England.

Last year at UConn the Minutemen tied the Huskies 0-0. UMass coach Jeff Gettler hopes that the Minutemen can improve on last year's effort against the most consistently dominant soccer program in New England.

"This game means a lot to us, as it does to them," said Gettler of today's match. "We're playing for pride. We're looking to establish ourselves, for the end of this year and for next year."

UConn coach Joe Morrone downplayed his team's fortunes as of late, citing "injuries and illness" as problems for his squad. "We're not playing well at all," he said, noting that the team's last three matches resulted in two ties and a loss, hurting the Huskies' shot at the Big East tournament.

Morrone cited midfielder Rob Lindell and defenders Chris Albrecht and Chris Cutshall as his strongest players. Lindell leads the Huskies in scoring with 15 points (5 goals, five assists), while goalkeeper Tom Foley holds a goals-against average of 1.00 in ten games.

Coach Morrone added that "we've had problems putting the ball in the net lately. I'm not too happy with how we've been playing." The Huskies have only two goals in their last three games, and are 1-5-2 in road games this year.

Minuteman defensive back Darren Stone received his fifth yellow card at George Washington, and will sit out today's game, as directed by NCAA's five yellow card-one game suspension rule. "Obviously, this hurts us, as losing Kylish for the same reason hurt us at West Virginia," said Gettler.

Other players who may have to sit this one out for UMass are Arron Zandy and Justin Edelman. Zandy suffered a concussion against GW, and is questionable for today. Edelman has a sprained ankle and doubtfully will play. Andrew Bird and Matt Edgerly replace the two for UMass.

Did someone say 'Pizza?' The first 100 spectators at today's match on the Hill receive a slice of pizza and a plastic cup, courtesy of Pizza Hut.

Duffey discusses budget crisis with students

President-Chancellor Joseph Duffey

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

In the second of a series of information sessions, President-Chancellor Duffey said yesterday that student fees must rise next semester and a host of other cost-cutting initiatives will need to be taken to bridge a $10.6 million shortfall.

Speaking before a standing-room-only crowd of more than 200 students in the Cape Cod Lounge, Duffey said the fiscal crisis affecting the University of Massachusetts requires immediate action to avoid an even more drastic scenario of midyear "massive" layoffs and an "unacceptable $800" fee increase.

He said student fees will increase next semester although a figure has not yet been determined. He said a "massive campaign" will be conducted for scholarships for financially needy students.

The Board of Trustees has already set aside $600,000 in anticipation of the increase — with UMass-Amherst as the only campus in the system to do so, he said.

"We may debate endlessly tuition and fee increases and the value of an education but a midyear fee increase is embarrassing to us," he said.

Duffey, who was flanked by several high-level administrators at the meeting, said "yet further cuts" will be needed mainly in library accounts and in the University Computing Center.

A third measure proposed by Duffey would request all University employees — some 5,200 — to take up to a five-day furlough. He has estimated that the unpaid furlough would save $750,000 a day.

"This is a partial retrenchment but a painful one," he said. "We may not be able to achieve it since so many of the elements are out of our hands."

John Cole, the president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said at the faculty information session held Monday that his union would not consider a furlough for their employees at the present time.

Duffey said the administration will also seek a "one time" reduction in some fees, especially the student activities fee — which funds the Student Activities Trust Fund — in response to an imposed higher curriculum fee. SATF finances most registered student organizations.

"We will reduce these fees to decrease the impact of the other increased fees," he said. "It is in order to decrease the impact on academic programs."

Duffey was criticized by several students for supporting Democratic gubernatorial candidate John Silber's proposal to raise tuition to $5,000 a semester. Duffey said he believes the proposal has some merit, and he feels tuition should be based on the ability to pay.

He has endorsed Silber's tuition proposals, although he said that the actual figure is too high. Duffey has not endorsed a candidate for governor and refused to disclose his choice yesterday.

"I wish [higher education] could be free but it's not possible," he said. "I wish it could be low but it would then be mediocre."

SGA votes down theatre's petition

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

The undergraduate Student Senate voted down a petition to grant the New WORLD Theatre $1,500 in funds to cover costs for an overbudgeted production last night.

Representatives of the New WORLD Theatre, a registered student organization which sponsors four multicultural productions on campus yearly, said their last production, 20th Century Groove, ran $6,000 over expected costs due to sudden technical production costs.

"We had thought that we could get equipment for free, but didn't," said Kenneth Chu, a fundraising associate for the theatre. "Our overbudgeting was entirely unforeseen."

Chu said the theatre had attempted to find other resources such as the Union Video Center, but were unable. 20th Century Groove, which was presented on Oct. 12, 13 and 14, was the only production this semester to be produced and written by the theatre itself. The entire production cost close to $20,000, he said.

The motion went into debate in the Finance Committee with supporters viewing the grant as a means to promote diversity on campus, while opponents felt the grant would set a precedent of breaking senate budget policy.

"The New WORLD Theatre is a valuable part of our campus community which promotes cultural enrichment," said Dan Cohen, a Third World Caucus senator.

Angus McQuilken, the student trustee, argued that the theatre would have to stay within the budget guidelines approved last semester since the loss would not put the theatre's account into deficit.

"They have to take responsibility for their own management," McQuilken said. "We cannot start covering RSO deficits or then we will start going into deficit."

The grant, if allocated, would have been 15 percent of the $9,560 operational budget which the Finance Committee grants or loans to RSOs who need to fund an unexpected event, he said.

Jason Kofman, a Commuter senator, made a motion to amend the petition by making half of the grant into a loan. The amendment passed the Finance Committee by 10 votes.

After two and a half hours of motions and debates, the senate accepted the Finance Committee's recommendation by a vote of 29 to 48 without debate.

"I think that it is sad that [the senate] couldn't find it within their organizational body to support something as vital to the community as New WORLD Theatre," said Yvonne Mendez, the assistant director and an adviser to the theatre.

Mendez said she would re-petition the senate at a future meeting.

A special order to freeze the accounts and to ban non-student staff in the Student Activities Office was postponed to next Wednesday's meeting.

News reports from both Israeli and Palestinian sources, as well as eyewitness accounts from Jerusalem, provide more details about the sequence of events that led to the violent incidents at the Haram al-Sharif (Dome of the Rock) in Jerusalem's Old City on Oct. 8.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Estimates of the number of Palestinian casualties in the incident vary. According to an Oct. 9 press release by the Jerusalem-based Palestine Human Rights Information Center, Israeli security forces killed 21 Palestinians and injured more than 500. The New York Times reported 21 dead and 150 injured (Oct. 16). An Oct. 10 PHRIC preliminary report on the incident stated, "Throughout the morning hours of 8 October, news spread that the Israeli right-wing group, 'Temple Mount Faithful' was planning to enter Al-Aqsa mosque and place the 'foundation stone for the Third Jewish Temple.' Accordingly, an estimated 10,000 Palesti-

Depts. facing termination discuss options

By JULIA SEREBRINSKY
Collegian Staff

Graduate students and faculty members from the four academic programs slated for elimination met yesterday in an effort to formulate an agenda to challenge the administration's proposal to terminate the programs.

Marc Kenen, Graduate Student Senate Vice President, proposed the creation of a steering committee consisting of graduate students and faculty from the four targeted programs. He suggested that the committee do "something visible" in making the campus community aware of "what kind of action can be done to stop the University from falling apart."

At the meeting, graduate students agreed that the main goal of the effort would be raising the question of the "mission of the University" and seeing if it had been met.

They also agreed that the steering committee should aim at making the University community aware that the proposed cuts are disproportionately affecting minorities and women.

The graduate students and faculty also agreed to send a message to the University that the programs slated for elimination are not taking the proposal "lying down," and will continue to "advertise the need for Public Services on campus."

According to Kenen, the administration had previously targeted programs from Public Services on campus for possible reductions and terminations, and "devised the data to fit the agenda."

One graduate student proposed an option to lobby the Faculty Senate members to change their approval vote. It would take an overwhelming majority at the Faculty Senate to overturn the administration's proposal to reduce and eliminate departments, Kenen said.

George Cernaba, a faculty member from the Community Health Education program, suggested "going for the throat" in reassessing the need for program elimination, suggesting that there is an excess within the administration itself, and the steering committee should "find out where the fat of this University is."

Graduate students and faculty agreed that something has to be done to attract attention and draw support to their cause. At the end of the meeting, they made tentative plans to hold a protest next Thursday in the form of a mock funeral procession.

According to Kenen, there are 300 graduate students in the programs slated for termination — 12 in Professional Preparation, 40 in Community Health Education, 130 in Staff Development and 100 in Organization Development.

Electronic coupon card debuts

By MICHELLE LOCKE
The Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — The latest high-tech innovation to hit the supermarket checkout line is a slick plastic card designed to replace the old handfuls of ragged paper coupons proffered by thrifty shoppers.

The new programs, being tested at several chains nationwide, are designed to build information on customer buying patterns and reach the shopper who wants to be thrifty but can't be bothered with the clip-and-save approach, industry officials said.

"Nobody wants to cut out coupons anymore because everyone is busy with their illustrious career," said John Karolefski, senior editor of the trade publication Supermarket News. "We're a credit card society and this is another card."

The electronic coupon made its western Massachusetts debut this week as Springfield-based Big Y mailed out 150,000 of its new "Express Saving Club" cards.

The cards, which anyone can apply for and receive at Big Y's 20 stores, will be presented to the cashier. The cards replace store coupons only, manufacturers' coupons will be redeemed as usual.

When passed over the store's scanning equipment, the bar code on the back of the card will identify the customer by number and automatically discount items the customer has selected on which Big Y and its vendors are offering savings.

"The beauty of this is you neither forget them at home in a drawer or wallet or try to remember what week they're good for," said Claire D'Amour, vice president for marketing at Big Y.

Electronic coupons first appeared in stores in Virginia in 1987 and have become increasingly popular, Karolefski said.

A division of Citicorp which runs the credit card type programs has pilot electronic coupons running in about two dozen stores around the country, said Bill Ahearn, of the company's New York offices.

Catholics for a Free Choice challenges Vatican stance

By STACY NEALE
Collegian Correspondent

While controversial speaker Frances Kissling, the president of Catholics for a Free Choice, spoke to an audience of mostly women last night at the Unitarian Society of Northampton, about a dozen anti-choice picketers protested outside.

Kissling said, "I do not understand why it is so important to those who are not seeking health care to come and assert their own moral opinions on the issue of abortion," Kissling said.

Frances Kissling

Catholics for a Free Choice, based in Washington, D.C., works towards helping women achieve an equal role in the Roman Catholic Church and how to recognize the dominant position men play in the Church, Kissling said.

"Women have good capacities to make a decision on whether, if and when to have an abortion," she said. "Women should be legally allowed to exercise these capacities."

Catholics for a Free Choice takes the moral issue, as well as the legal issue of abortion very seriously, Kissling said. The organization promotes the need for a moral understanding of the decisions women have to make.

She said men often block the passages to these health care facilities.

"Men don't even understand the pain and anguish of the decision a woman has to make in order to have an abortion," she said. "Women will not be deterred by these bullies."

Women have sacrificed their health, life and dignity when abortion was illegal and they still do in some countries where it still is illegal, Kissling said.

Kissling asked why anyone who is not Catholic would be interested in what the Roman Catholic Church is doing about the issue of abortion. "Because the single most potential opponent to legal

WMUA holds telethon

Student-run station approaches $15,000 goal

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

WMUA, the official student-run radio station of the University of Massachusetts, is holding its annual telethon, and according to two station members, it will be a successful fundraiser.

Kara-Jean Barrett, the station's telethon coordinator, said that, with two days left, the station had raised about $10,000 of its $15,000 goal. She also said that judging from the amount of funds raised earlier in the week, she knew that the goal would be met.

"We were over the halfway mark on Monday, so we're doing well," Barrett said.

Barrett also said that large numbers of pledges during the Polka-thon, which began the telethon on Saturday, helped the drive start off quickly. "They helped us out a lot," she said. "It's the biggest fundraiser of the telethon."

According to WMUA Manager Heather Smith, most of the pledges traditionally come from listeners from the surrounding communities, rather than UMass students, and added that this was not surprising, due to the lower income level among students than among members of the community.

"There's much more community support [for the telethon] than student support," Smith said, "but that's to be expected because students have budget increases [to pay for] and that's hard on them."

Smith added that students do contribute to the fundraiser. "We do get student support and we appreciate it," she said.

Barrett said that local businesses, such as Pearl Street nightclub and Fly By Night Futons, have been very generous in donating merchandise the station uses as bonuses or incentives to contribute. "The majority of the businesses we did contact were very supportive," she said.

Unlike other community-supported radio stations, which have several telethons per year, Smith said, WMUA only holds one telethon per year, and it covers one-third of the expenses the station incurs.

"The telethon is the most important fundraising event in the whole year," she said.

Smith said the revenues from the telethon, along with money from other fundraisers and underwriting by local businesses and Student Activities Trust Fund budget allocations, will help the station cover expenses ranging from transportation for its sportscasters to parts for the station's transmitter. She added that the money from the telethon is especially important when their trust fund account runs out.

Both Smith and Barrett said they both believe the goal is within reach. "We have a shot at making it," Smith said.

Barrett added that she was nervous at first about her job as telethon coordinator at the station, but that she now feels that the telethon has been successful.

"I'm very pleased with the way things are going," Barrett said. "I wasn't sure how it would go, but everything came together well."

The telethon ends Friday night.

Weld outlines proposals

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Republican gubernatorial candidate William Weld outlined several proposals yesterday to revamp state government, including plans to allocate social services based on people's ability to pay.

"In my view, state government exists to deliver services and regulate private activities, not to serve as an employment vehicle for state workers," Weld said in remarks to the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council.

Weld, a former U.S. Congressman, said aside from using a "means test" for the delivery of human services program, he would also use such a method for doling out state scholarships.

Weld further proposed splitting the Executive Office of Human Services into two secretariats.

Reps. bash each other

WASHINGTON (AP) — Nerves frayed by weeks of bare-knuckled, partisan debate on the budget led to derogatory statements Wednesday by Rep. Henry Hyde about Rep. Barney Frank's sexuality.

During the time period devoted to one-minute speeches at the beginning of everyday's House floor action, Frank, a Democrat from Massachusetts, berated the Republicans for flip-flopping on taxes.

He said he wasn't in the chamber, but read in the Congressional Record, that 10 days ago "someone passing himself off as the Republican leader" urged a vote for new taxes, but Tuesday said taxes should not be raised.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Misinformation on CLT corrected

Proponents of question three ("the CLT initiative") on the November ballot have recently been promulgating dangerous misinformation about just what tax and free rollbacks are actually included in the wording of the ballot question. The claim has been made that some of the taxes and fees to be reduced include fees to attend UMass. This is patently incorrect.

John U. Davis

In a recent interview, Howard Foley, the president of the Massachusetts High Technology Council, which is one of the principal backers of the CLT initiative, explained to me how tuition and fees at public institutions of higher education would be affected by question three.

He told me that fees to attend state colleges and universities are explicitly excluded and tuition is not included at all in the rollbacks prescribed by the authors of the initiative.

The reason for excluding tuition and fees from coverage, Foley said, was that backers of question three were "more comfortable leaving decisions on setting tuition and fees with people in those institutions [state colleges and universities]" as they would be better placed to make those decisions.

In examining available information, can we expect that tuition and fees would be cut in the wake of the passage of question three? Between fiscal years 1988 and 1991, state funding for higher education was cut 22.4 percent. The largest portion of that cut has been levied in the last year alone. As a consequence, tuition has increased over 50 percent in the last three years and fees have increased over 90 percent over the same period.

If question three passes, the best estimate of the Board of Regents of Higher Education is that funds available to higher education for the second half of the fiscal year would be cut 38 percent. That is, the budget that is currently forcing program eliminations and layoffs of faculty and staff would be deemed too "fat" under CLT and would be subject to further slashes.

Given this dismal state of affairs in public higher education, tuition and fee cuts are absolutely inconceivable any time in the near future, especially if the CLT initiative passes.

Recent cuts to UMass have had serious negative consequences. For example, the number of employees has already been reduced by 350; the national ranking of the library has dropped significantly (and just this week President-Chancellor Duffey has projected further library cuts); the physical condition of University facilities has deteriorated while needed renovations are postponed, and student financial aid has been reduced, as have campus job opportunities. The math is clear — UMass, already seriously ill, would be given its coup de grace by question three.

All members of the University community face a decision of enormous magnitude on election day. Ignoring facile rhetoric and cutting through the untruths, one must decide how to vote on question three. The initiatives proponents have failed to show me how its passage could mean anything but the utter destruction of public higher education in Massachusetts.

No business as usual, win or lose

Editor's note: This is one in a series from State Representative Stan Rosenberg about the fiscal crisis in Massachusetts.

They say question three will "send a message" to state government. We are told a "yes" on question three is a vote against an overweight and unbalanced state budget, while a "no" vote is simply a defense of the status quo. But don't believe them.

Stan Rosenberg

If question three passes or not, the State will undergo reforms. Voting "no" on question three is not voting for business as usual.

Our new governor and a substantially different Legislature will overhaul state government simply because they must. Public anger is reason enough, but even without the irrational demands of question three, the facts speak to the troubles that lie ahead. If allowed to go unchecked, Medicaid expenditures alone — federally-mandated health care for the elderly, disabled and poor — will cost $16 billion by the middle of the 1990s. That's $2 billion more than our entire state budget today.

The state budget, by its nature, is growing too fast. Revenues can't keep pace. And the problem clearly isn't overspending on education, social services, the environment or even a top-heavy government loaded with state employees. In all these areas, we're spending less today than we were two or three years ago. State government now has fewer employees than it did in 1981.

Massachusetts' budget shortfall is largely due to a doubling in local aid to cities and towns over a seven-year period and five specific mandated accounts, now commonly labeled "budget hunters." Together, the "budget-busters" consume one third of the state budget. There is almost unanimous agreement that what we need are management reforms, not more across-the-board cuts.

Even the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation and the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, the state's two most conservative watchdog organizations, both oppose question three.

Taxpayers Foundation said: "Funding for many state programs is actually below 1989 or, as in the case of local aid and education, below even 1988 levels. The state will spend less for these purposes than it did two years ago. Nevertheless, total spending increases. Why? Because costs are going up dramatically."

It's time for a serious look at areas which "budget-busters" encompass and the strategies for bringing them under control.

Health care. The costliest of the bunch: 30 percent of all state spending is for some type of health care. Medical costs are skyrocketing for everyone — individuals, businesses and government alike. In Massachusetts, an overuse of emergency rooms, overregulation, excess beds in community hospitals and our role as one of the world's leading centers of medical research and training all contribute to high costs.

Through Medicaid, the state provides health care to people who can't afford it. Three quarters are senior citizens and disabled; the rest are the unemployed and the working poor. We'll spend $2.6 million this year on Medicaid and it's growing by 15 percent every year. To control Medicaid, the state had already improved payment collection, eliminated payment for some procedures and begun competitive bidding for the purchase of medical drugs.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg, from Amherst and Pelham, is a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Criticism tainted with anti-Semitism unfair

As the Hillel Council, we understand the legitimate criticisms levied against Israeli policy in the occupied territories. We ask that criticisms are presented within the realm of political discourse, not in rhetoric which veers from the path of truth and sometimes, intentionally or not, assumes a form of anti-Semitism. One can responsibly denounce incidents of beatings and killings if one is familiar with the specifics involved in the situation.

Pratip Dastidar in his column, "Murder in Jerusalem (Third World Affairs, Oct. 11)," said [the recent killings in Jerusalem] were a "systematic massacre" and a "Zionist rampage."

We ask those, both pro and con, to limit political discussions to the intellectual arena, not to the oversimplified inflammatory words often found in the dogma of propaganda pamphlets.

While we understand some anti-Israel arguments are legitimate and others are rhetoric, we feel Prof. Ann Ferguson and R. Sheedfar put their column, "Fight against war before it's too late (Oct. 15)," into another league and most likely inadvertently into the path of anti-Semitism.

Their column suggests answers to the question of how to avert war in the Persian Gulf. They tell the reader "the only way to control your life is to challenge those who rule it." The writers suggest the "U.S. government, pressed by the Pentagon and Israel lobbies," rules their lives.

If one considers an often-cited aspect of anti-Semitism is to create the image of the conniving Jewish moneymaker who seeks to rule the world by dominating positions in politics, then their column is most definitely tainted with underlying anti-Semitism.

This same allusion is also found in the Russian anti-Semitic book, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, Henry Ford's Dearborn Newspaper and Hitler's Mein Kampf.

In order to prevent more instances of this and other types of anti-Semitism from appearing in future issues of the Collegian and at other information dissemination outlets on campus, Hillel, as the largest Jewish organization on campus, demands that when referring to the Israeli-Palestinian issue that it be done in a mature, intellectually responsible manner, and that the Jewish people on campus are accorded the respect and sensitivity all other non-majority groups receive and deserve in our community.

Troops' indiscriminate fire appalling in itself

Adam Stein mounts the best possible defense of Israel's massacre of 21 Palestinians at the Haram As-Sharif by presenting a portrait of shared blame ("Issues are not that simple," Oct. 15). Unfortunately for him, the "facts" that he used to support his claim have already been thoroughly debunked by the New York Times and many others.

He spoke of the soldiers' concern for the safety of Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall. We now know for certain all the Jews had been evacuated long before the shooting began and that there is a videotape filmed by one Darrin Glassman proving this.

He spoke of the fear on the part of a "few dozen [troops] facing a few thousand [civilians]," whereas we know absolutely that the massacre was conducted by a strike force of at least 200 heavily armed troops who "began firing automatic weapons into crowds of Palestinians. Bullet holes in the sides of the Mosques make that clear...The shooting took place in bursts of unaimed automatic-weapon fire from the hip, spraying a large area (New York Times, p. A12, Oct. 15)."

The massacre was indeed a stark example of the "armed against the defenseless" and a "bloodbath," but no more than we have come to expect of Israeli occupation forces in Palestine. Occupying troops opening indiscriminate fire on unarmed civilians at the third holiest site of Islam, Mr. Stein, is appalling simplicity itself.

Reflections and insight of a UMass alumnus

By DAWN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

An alumnus of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, David L. Walker received his Bachelor's of Arts degree in economics in May, 1988.

Walker has been working as an Advertising Sales Manager for the past year at Reach New England. Reach New England is America's only regional publication focusing on minorities and women as business professionals and potential vendors.

Reflecting on his years as an undergraduate, Walker said he recognizes positive and negative changes that have occurred. Walker points out that, although there have been more courses directed towards multicultural curriculum and progress, "these advances are null and void" due to budget cuts resulting in University setbacks.

Walker said that upon visiting UMass and from talking to students, it is easily observed that fewer minorities are receiving the financial opportunities to attend the University. He said "civility training means nothing if there aren't enough minority students on campus to benefit from it. It defeats the purpose."

As for the lack of minority administrators here at the University, Walker said UMass needs to recruit more young administrators to "prune them and train them to be successors." Walker believes that current administrators are doing a fine job, but they need more administrative support. Without more minorities in administrative positions, Walker said that minority students are more susceptible to leaving UMass with a feeling of alienation from the University.

Commenting on the value of a UMass education, Walker said that a UMass education is "comparable to any other school of higher education in this country." Walker said socially he learned how to deal with people on professional levels, and to tolerate and understand different philosophies in conducting business through his involvements in registered student organizations (RSOs) here at UMass.

Walker said he has been told by human resource managers and colleagues that there is power in a UMass degree. He said "Yes, you do have an advantage walking into a human resource department with a UMass degree because the school has a fine reputation in the work force for producing knowledgeable students."

Walker said more minority students need to get involved with the RSOs on campus to "sustain organizations at the University that have been established to help them to get a well-rounded education." He said, "What you do with the knowledge you obtain at UMass depends on the individual and their perseverance and will to achieve; but the degree itself will give you the opportunity to do that."

Walker said from experience he can say that graduating seniors have a lot to look forward to. Due to the fact the job market is tight, students must be prepared to relocate if necessary.

When asked for words of wisdom for graduating seniors, Walker said, "Be eager to speak, but be wise to listen. Always seek the knowledge of your peers and predecessors because obviously they can offer insight to roads and paths you are going to take. Take their models of success and try to mirror them in your own image."

Cold facts lead to paranoia

Reginald Perry

I don't have time to keep on schoolin' individuals on the issue of anti-Semitism or "Anti-Jewish Myths".

After reading "Anti-Jewish Myths: A Double Standard" by Nathan Krystall that appeared in the Oct. 9 edition of the Collegian, a somewhat of a rebuttal to my article that appeared in the Oct. 4 edition of the Collegian, it pleased me for a split second because we seem to agree on the Silber issue. But it pissed me off as Mr. Krystall "played himself."

First off let's get something straight here, on the issue of "taking a few dirty jabs at Jewish people." That's not the case here. I'd be a fool to do such, due to the fact that I have Jewish people who are very close and dear to my family. Secondly, I have plenty of friends who are Jewish. The attitude of your article, if I didn't know any better, makes me out to slap the Jewish people who are a part of life, in the face, which is ludicrous.

If you were to stay within the confines of my article, you might have seen that my point is more than clear. On the issue of "saying anything and getting away with it," why don't you address the validity of the statement? An apology which is owed to the residents of areas A & B (in Boston) is still owed to this day. Just as I mentioned before, an apology was offered to the Jewish community by Chuck D. for something for which he is not directly at fault.

I am sick and tired of when someone, anyone for that matter, speaks of Whites being in the position of power, it's termed as being anti-Semitic or anti-Jewish. On the issue of my usage of the word "crucified," should Black people take offense every time the words "slave" or "whip" are cast in the open? If so, let me know, if not, I think you should pay less attention to the words I choose to articulate with (for there are no subliminal messages behind them) and pay more attention to the focus of the article. You might just find you will learn a few things.

Finally, as far as your accusing me of perpetuating Jewish myths, that's Bull*-!!! I was expressing my view on something that causes me great distress, and you took part of the pie and blew it out of context.

Like I said at the start of this article, I don't have the time to educate, if you want to sit and talk, look for me. I'm not hard to find!

S. Africa: violence continues

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Police arrested three White men yesterday and seized a cache of automatic weapons in connection with a recent attack on a bus in which six Blacks were killed and 27 wounded.

The three men are believed to be linked to extreme right-wing White groups opposed to government plans to end apartheid, according to local journalists. Police declined to comment on the three men's political affiliations.

Police said the men were arrested in a raid in Durban and AK-47 assault rifles and other weapons were seized.

A bus used by Blacks was attacked with automatic gunfire near Durban on Oct. 9, 1990. Everyone on the bus was either killed or wounded.

If the suspects do have right-wing affiliations, the attack would be one of the worst racial incidents since White extremists vowed to fight government plans to scrap apartheid and share power with the Black majority.

Israeli writer lectures on defining terms

By ALISON BUCKHOLTZ
Collegian Correspondent

Comparing the terms Jew, Zionist and Israeli to the three strings on a guitar, Israeli writer A.B. Yehoshua hosted "an evening of definitions" in his lecture called "Jew, Zionist, Israeli: Honing the Concepts" in Memorial Hall last night.

"Anyone can play the guitar as he likes, but the three strings are all tuned the same way," he said. "We have to define the basic terms we are using, Jew, Zionist and Israeli, and first agree on the language."

Only after this, he said, can related issues be discussed rationally.

"Who is a Jew? The question of 3,000 years," Yehoshua said. According to halkhaic (ancient Jewish law) guidelines, "A Jew is the child of a Jewish mother." This is a "definition of emptiness," he argued, "because it says that to be a Jew has nothing to do with being Jewish," merely to do with biology and blood.

Instead, Yehoshua proposed that liberty is the crucial element in defining oneself as a Jew. "A person is Jewish simply because he defines himself as Jewish," he said. "We are not a race, but a people, one with open doors to get out and open doors to get in."

This definition of a Jew is the backbone of the enormous Soviet emigration to Israel, and intrinsically connected to Zionism, Yehoshua said. "The U.N. established Israel in 1948 as a Jewish state, a place for Jews to go when there's trouble," he explained.

According to him, today the U.S.S.R. is collapsing, and its Jews have a place to go and this is the simple application of the theory of Zionism that confuses so many.

After Israel's creation, the definition of Zionism changed from "the will to establish a Jewish state" to "confirming the principle that the State of Israel belongs to the Jewish people," he said. "Israel's owners are all the Jewish people,' and Zionism promises "one thing to its people: a state."

Those born in Israel, like Yehoshua himself, have a more difficult problem defining themselves. Israelis "have a jacket called Israeli," he said, "the cover of our real identity, which is Jewish." But an Israeli identity is one of a total Jew: "We implement Jewish values and ideas in every aspect of Israeli life — or we need to try to."

Therefore, he said, the relation of Jew to Israeli is one of part to whole, and only when the two converge can one be a "total Jew."

"Jews see the world as a Howard Johnson's. If a country is a good hotel, they'll stay. But a country shouldn't be a hotel," he said.

Instead, a country should be "like Israel is to me, a country, family, identity, home. Being Israeli is my skin, not my jacket," he said. "I can't change it, and I wouldn't."

He said that any change in the present administration will be a "better situation than we have at the present." Duffey said he hopes the next governor will see public education "as not a charity but as a fundamental investment in the state."

Duffey was also questioned repeatedly about the Everywoman's Center, which has lost three staff members since the beginning of the summer, reducing services and support.

Dean of Students Joanne Vanin said when the difficult choices were made by her office during the summer concerning the EWC, staff members said it was a choice between giving up "your right hand or your left."

After answering several questions concerning the EWC and charges of racism, sexism and classism, Duffey fended off accusations by saying, "I just reject that."

After continual accusations, he raised his voice to silence hecklers and said, "I'm not interested in maintaining my innocence. I'm trying to lead a campus in a broken and disturbed world."

Make-believe investment game to begin

By JULIE McKENNA
Collegian Correspondent

Starting Nov. 1, University of Massachusetts students and faculty have the chance to join some 15,000 other students representing over 500 colleges and universities to compete in the 3rd Annual AT&T Collegiate Investment Challenge, to test their investment skills in simulated investments in today's financial market.

"As an amateur, you are given the opportunity to compare yourself to the top brokers of Wall Street," said senior business finance major Steven Pearlstein, who was a top nationwide finisher last year.

Competitors are given a chance at a top prize of $25,000 and a week in the Bahamas, and local sponsors are offering an IBM compatible computer, according to Pearlstein, who is also the Finance Investment Club president.

The Challenge is sponsored by the Finance Investment Club along with American Computer Innovators, The Pub and 99.3 WHMP FM Radio.

The Challenge is broken into three divisions: high school, undergraduate and graduate and educators.

To take the Challenge look for information in the School of Management Library. The deadline for sign-ups is Saturday, Oct. 27.

For the next four months everyone who participates will be set up with a fictional $500,000 brokerage account, complete with a toll-free AT&T 800 Service line to make trades with and buy real stocks at real prices.

USA Today, a national co-sponsor, will also be providing weekly coverage and will feature top student performers and colleges in its Money section every Monday throughout the event.

Over $200,000 in prizes will be awarded. The 10 students with the highest portfolio values by Feb. 28, 1991, will win Bahamas vacations compliments of the Bahamas Ministry of Tourism and the Holiday Inn Lucaya. Besides the $25,000 to the top winner, nine scholarships will also be awarded.

The contest will be followed by an awards ceremony in March 1991.

Expert: U.S. needs new world vision

By MARK HENSLEY
Collegian Correspondent

An expert in foreign policy said yesterday that not since 1945 has the United States faced such critical decisions concerning its future role in the world as the ones that it is facing as a result of the Cold War coming to an end.

At a speech at Mt. Holyoke College entitled "The United States in the New World," Dr. Richard Barnet of the Institute for Policy Studies criticized the U.S. for not having "a vision of how to relate to the New World without continuing the strategies of the Cold War."

"The United States has the opportunity now to redefine what we'll be in the New World Order, but we are continuing to view the world through the prism of the Cold War," he said.

Although the Soviet Union is no longer perceived as a threat, the U.S. has chosen world instability as its new number one enemy.

Barnet said that the U.S. is continuing to define its position in the New World Order by insisting on unilateral U.S. military power, by involving itself in the politics of other countries such as those in the Middle East, and by continuing to accumulate arms.

He added that the U.S.'s consistent overexpenditure on arms is creating a cyclical economic problem which, unless remedied, is likely to cause the decline of the U.S. both domestically and internationally.

He argued that by spending so much on arms, the U.S. is sacrificing education, social services and its industrial base and thus directly affecting the economy.

"Unless we improve the U.S. economy and the economy of other countries, we are going to have to rely more heavily on arms as exports," he said.

By exporting arms, the U.S. is increasing the chance for instability and conflict in the world, he said. This in turn perpetuates the perceived need for the U.S. to continue producing arms to deal with conflicts such as the current Middle East crisis.

The lecture was sponsored by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies as part of a continuing series of lectures being held this semester. The lectures are free and open to the public.

abortion comes from the Roman Catholic Church," she said.

The Catholic Church forbids abortion in all circumstances even to save the mother's life. Even some priests in the church are embarrassed by this rigid position, she said.

Kissling said the reason for the church's anti-abortion stance comes from the Bible which stated, "Thou shalt not kill." The Vatican says capital punishment is justified. They also state that in a just war men are free to decide whether to take another's life for reasons of self-defense.

"Why then is there no just abortion theory to save a woman's life?" Kissling said.

Kissling said her advice to Catholics is to stop being good Catholics and start saying what you believe in to the priests.

nians arrived at the Haram Al-Sharif to perform prayers and prevent the entry of the Israelis."

"According to several eyewitnesses there were no confrontations in the Haram al-Sharif until 10:40 a.m., when police forces began surrounding women who were praying on the upper tier of the Haram al-Sharif plaza, and fired tear gas at the women without provocation."

"Youths then started to pelt the police with stones in order to stop the barrage of gas. The police retreated from the plaza, closing the doors leading to the Haram al-Sharif. Eyewitnesses reported that Moslem clergymen and officials tried to calm the crowd."

"At about the same time, a large force of policemen, borderguards, and security service (Shabak) agents attacked the plaza from the Moghrabi Gate. Indiscriminately they fired directly at the worshippers, hitting several. Since the Shabak agents were dressed in civilian clothes, many people thought they were members of the Temple Mount Faithful entering under police protection, and thus immediately started throwing stones and anything else at hand at the troops to defend themselves."

"Eyewitnesses reported that much of the heavy gunfire was coming from a large-calibre machine gun carried by a borderguard. Another soldier behind him was carrying the belts of ammunition. Other people at the scene reported that someone was shooting into the worshippers from atop a building in the adjacent Jewish Quarter of the Old City."

According to the PHRIC report, Palestinians threw stones over the walls of the compound and onto the Jewish Quarter, hitting a number of Israelis only after gunfire came from that direction.

Zeev Shiff reported in the Oct. 10 issue of the Israeli paper Ha-aretz that information, confirmed by testimonies given by arrestees indicates that "contrary to what was previously reported, the Palestinians did not plan to attack the Jews praying (at the Wailing Wall). They wanted only to prevent the entry of the Temple Mount Faithful to the mosque compound. The attack on the Jewish worshippers developed later as a spontaneous act."

"According to these sources, all previous descriptions of Palestinians preparing a day ahead, storing stones and iron bars and coming into the mosque compound a day ahead, are false. In the al-Haram, there is a lot of construction work and, therefore, a lot of stones are available."

Another Israeli paper, Kol Ha'ir, reported on Oct. 3 that Prime Minister Yitzhaq Shamir "asked the police to work towards the extermination of the Intifada in Jerusalem." "The police have placed all their hopes these days in the newly-formed Gideonim units, whose specialty is going to be the implementation of unorthodox methods against Arab villages."

Israel Shahak from the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights said, in an information release on Oct. 9, that the 'settlers' who entered the Haram al-Sharif with borderguards and police at about 10:30 a.m. on Oct.8 were in fact Shabak agents in civilian dress. He also noted that several people confirmed seeing Israeli civilians shooting into the Haram from the roofs of nearby buildings.

The PHRIC report also states that an estimated 250 soldiers and police began closing off the area around the Maqassed and Augusta Victoria hospitals on the Mount of Olives as the Palestinian dead and wounded began arriving there.

"Fully armed in battle gear and with the assistance of attack dogs, the troops prevented many Palestinian residents from donating much-needed blood to the wounded."

The PHRIC reported that between 12:30 and 1:00 p.m., the soldiers fired tear gas into the crowd of people gathered in front of Maqassed hospital and into the hospital itself. The Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights confirms this incident, noting that the tear gas forced the "evacuation of the new-born and OBGYN units."

PHRIC fieldworkers present at the scene witnessed pregnant women vomiting from the balconies and windows of the ward due to tear gas and saw a 22-year old woman shot in the back with a rubber/marble bullet. Several of the PHRIC staff were also hit by the "hail of rubber bullets outside Maqassed at 3:30 p.m."

Responses to the incident in the United States included a Palestinian appeal to the U.N. Security Council for protection against "Israeli soldiers, settlers and armed religious zealots."

The Jewish Committee on the Middle East, an organization comprising Jewish professors at over 135 universities, issued a press release on Oct. 8 condemning the government of Israel for its "seriously excessive use of lethal force."

The President of the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination Committee, Albert Mokhiber said (in an Oct. 8 news release), "U.N. action is fully justified and required under international law, since the Israeli government has once again breached the Fourth Geneva Conventions which require that the occupying power protect, rather than exterminate the civilian population."

An Oct. 10 communique from "National Institutions and Personalities" in the Occupied Territories said the incident confirmed the "necessity of sending U.N. forces in order to keep peace and protect our people."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Smoother relations at work mean greater output, higher profits. You should be able to handle numerous tasks efficiently. You are truly visionary today and should trust your cattle.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) It is possible to improve your position at home or work today. Meetings with important individuals may cement a new alliance. Travel and sparkling conversation bring fascinating insights.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) Your powers of analysis are excellent, helping you make a big strides in the right direction. Important papers need your attention. Resist an urge to gamble. A sibling offers to play Cupid.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) A pet project can be furthered through cooperation and team effort. A close emotional tie reaches a new plateau. A get-together at your home or a friend's could turn out surprisingly well.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Relax, live a little, try giving in to temptation. An intelligent co-worker finds you extremely attractive. Security isn't everything - add some spice to your life. Make the first move!

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Your compelling personality evokes admiration from less confident associates. Let your showmanship be your means to financial success. Open your means to financial success.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You may be counting on the wrong things. Review your priorities. Impulsive statements and actions could boomerang. The events of the next few days should leave you feeling optimistic about the future.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) There may be more tension than usual between mates or business associates today. Easy does it! Do not try to force issues. Pay overdue bills and balance your checkbook. Romance sizzles.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) Take a long-range view of your life and make some specific plans. You may have to travel or contact people at a distance today. Make phone calls and be very persistent.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Projects and interviews will go well today. Do not despair if you encounter delays. Find time to contact your parents or grown offspring. A kind act will be richly rewarded.

VIRGO (Aug. 22-Sept. 22) Your skin is likely to turn a purplish-orange color after having a nightmare about tofu-yogurt squares. A big maroon gila monster, known to his friends as Bubba, is looking for you. He wants to feast on your toes for dinner. Don't go outside!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Keep a close eye on investing. Otherwise, you may get a lemon instead of a gem. Someone dear to you is under the weather, requiring a delicate touch. Put homework aside Sunday night. Enjoy your friends' company.

Gorbachev's economic plan condemned by Yeltsin

MOSCOW (AP) — President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's plan for switching to a free-market economy backs away from a 500-day timetable, and Boris N. Yeltsin, leader of the Russian republic, said it is doomed to fail within six months.

Gorbachev's 66-page blueprint, delivered to members of the national legislature Tuesday, is at least the fourth in a consuming and complicated series of plans for salvaging the failing economy.

"Another endeavor is thus being made to perpetuate the system hated by the people," Yeltsin said Tuesday. "The new program catastrophe which will break out within the first few months."

"If the...Parliament approves today's uncompromising program, it will take less than six months to realize that the chosen road is another blunder."

A text of Yeltsin's remarks to the Russian Federation's legislature was published today in Sovietskaya Rossiya, the Russian Communist newspaper.

Gorbachev's plan would give the 15 Soviet republics sweeping new powers to run the nation's economy, free many prices from government regulation and allow private ownership of businesses. It sets no timetable for the transition, but notes other nations have accomplished similar goals in one and a half to two years.

Gorbachev is to present his plan to the Supreme Soviet national legislaure on Friday, and the 542 members could vote on it as early as Saturday. Parliamentary committees began studying the proposals today.

Yeltsin, president of the Russian republic, and the Federation's other leaders have endorsed a radical plan for scrapping Communist central planning for a market-based economy in 500 days.

Yeltsin said the Russian republic could go ahead with that program on Nov.1, setting up its own currency, customs service and army.

He acknowledged this would be difficult and costly, even for the biggest and wealthiest of the 15 Soviet republics, but said: "If we show indecision in such a situation, we will lose the voters' trust and respect."

"If we procrastinate and put off [the reform] further, there will be nothing to reform because the economy will simply fall to pieces," he said.

Yeltsin said Gorbachev's program, if adopted, would increase the national budget deficit to about $520 billion.

"The consumer market inevitably will be swamped by a shower of paper (money) and prices may grow dozens of times," he said.

The plan Yeltsin has endorsed is named after its chief architect, economist Stanislav Shatalin. It differs from Gorbachev's plan in several key respects.

The Shatalin plan suggests selling factories to private owners, breaking up collective farms and returning land to peasants, but the Gorbachev plan drops a clear commitment to private ownership of land. It says only that republic authorities will decide conditions for giving land to people for agriculture.

The Shatalin plan would also gradually end all state control on prices. Under the Gorbachev plan, the government would still set prices in 1992 on bread, meat, dairy products and a few other staples.

Yeltsin said the Gorbachev plan was an attempt "to preserve the administrative bureaucratic system."

The proposal caps an intensive three-week effort by Gorbachev and top economists to resolve fundamental differences over how to change a system that fails to provide adequate food, shelter and services for the country's 285 million people.

Baker rejects greater Congressional role in crisis

WASHINGTON (AP) — Secretary of State James A. Baker III said yesterday Congress should not be given a larger role in determining whether U.S. troops are sent into combat against Iraq.

Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, suggested that President Bush consult with a congressional group on any action taken during the upcoming legislative recess.

Baker, testifying before the committee, said Bush was committed to continuing such consultation, even during a recess. "I would have a little bit of reservation about a formal mechanism," he said.

Baker's comments came after Sen. Jesse Helms accused the State Department of abandoning Christians in Lebanon and allowing the United Nations to infringe on Israel's sovereignty.

"What kind of policy do we have when we turn anti-Christian and anti-Jewish in one week," Helms thundered as Baker settled into the witness chair.

Baker made no immediate response to Helms' charges. In a 10-page prepared statement, he said Iraqi President Saddam Hussein "must fail if peace is to succeed."

Sen. Richard Lugar, R- Ind., said military action against Iraq was more likely now and that Congress should come back into session to authorize a declaration of war if one is needed.

But Baker said U.S. military actions to protect Americans in the region should not be limited.

Helms, a North Carolina Republican and a persistent critic of the State Department, began his comments by praising Bush for taking a strong stand against Saddam's occupation and annexation of Kuwait, its oil-rich neighbor in the gulf.

But the praise soured as Helms denounced the State Department, saying the agency had supported Iraq until just before the Aug. 2 invasion.

"Only the State Department could not see that he is a murderer, torturer and assassin," Helms said of Saddam.

Helms then called Syria's President Hafez Assad "an international gangster."

Assad, whom the administration has enlisted with its anti-Iraqi coalition, "has just completed the liquidation of another Middle Eastern state," Helms said, referring to the ouster of Michel Aoun, the last prominent "Christian Moronite" holdout against Syrian influence over Lebanon.

"What happened to our principles?" Helms asked. "Isn't the sovereignty of Lebanon just as important as the sovereignty of Kuwait?"

The State Department had urged Aoun to step aside, even as Syrian troops bore down on his Beirut stronghold. Aoun has taken refuge in the French Embassy.

Crew prepares for Head of the Charles Regatta

By DAVID GORVINE
Collegian Correspondent

The Head of the Charles Regatta is one of the most prestigious crew races in the country and this year UMass, thanks to a lottery-style invitation, will be entering a boat in the most competitive race of the Regatta, an event known as the Championship Eights.

This open division includes some of the top college teams in the country as well as Olympic training squads from the States and around the world.

Taking place on Sunday in Cambridge, this year's field will include boats from Temple, Georgetown, Harvard and Yale racing side by side with top amateur teams from Canada and Germany as well as local amateur clubs.

Considering the strength of the competition, the men's coach Dave Trond said he would be pleased with a finish in the top half, a finish which would leave a number of quality teams in UMass' wake.

The Charles is the third of four regattas scheduled in the fall season. In the first two — the Head of the Textile and the Head of the Connecticut — UMass finished in the middle of the pack in both the heavyweight and lightweight divisions.

Those results did not overly concern Trond, who said he wanted to use the fall season to prepare his rowers by blending the experience of the seniors with the strength of the sophomores.

For the Charles, however, the club's goals have been slightly adjusted.

"I'm looking to get the best race I can out of this one," said Trond. "We'll probably only have two sophomores in the boat and go with our experienced rowers."

The women's crew team has followed a similar course this season. Like many teams, they have been more concerned with developing technique than with winning the fall meets.

This year's club was described by team captain Rachel White as physically very strong, and features four returning seniors: Jen Blum, Susan Malone, Jen Geary, and White.

The team suffered a setback recently when a key rower, Alison Gurtwich, injured a back muscle at the Head of the Connecticut. She will sit out the rest of the fall season but will return next spring, when both the men and women look for successful seasons based on strength, experience and team depth.

Collegian photo by Tom Burke

The UMass men's heavyweight eight will be one of many boats entered at the Head of the Charles Regatta this Sunday in Cambridge. Boats competing will include Georgetown, Harvard, Temple and Yale from the Northeast, as well as boats from other parts of the continent, including Canada.

Volleyball drops 3-1 decision to UConn Huskies

By FELICE COHEN
Collegian Correspondent

This was another hard one to swallow.

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team lost Tuesday night at Connecticut 9-15, 5-15, 15-10 and 5-15, leaving the Minutewomen at 3-17 overall.

This is hardly a record to brag about, but coach Carol Ford is not totally down.

"We did improve in some areas that we've been lacking, such as our defense, serve receive and serving, but we were not able to put the ball away offensively."

Senior captain Nancy Sullivan did her best to keep things rolling for the Minutewomen. According to Ford she played well all around.

"She was the most aggressive hitter on the court," Ford said. "But the other hitters have to make more of a contribution."

UMass setter Angie Paloucci, who missed the first six weeks of the season due to illness, has demonstrated determination as well as good defense, Ford cited.

During most of last night's play, the Minutewomen did what they could just to keep the ball in play.

"Their lack of confidence is expected since they've been having trouble winning," Ford said of the loss.

Ford said UConn proved to be a much improved team with an excellent setter.

The Minutewomen play at George Washington at 7 p.m. this Friday.

Huskies shut out men's soccer

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts dominated Connecticut for the first 45 minutes of yesterday's game at Upper Boyden Field.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen, soccer games are 90 minutes long.

UConn got a goal from Rob Lindell 15 minutes into the second half, and controlled most of the second half as the Huskies beat UMass, 1-0.

"This game was emblematic of our season," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler. "We got a couple of chances in the first half, and we didn't connect. We might've put them away if we went into halftime with two goals, but instead, they get one goal in the second half and we run out of gas."

UConn came out on fire early in the second half, forcing play in the UMass zone. After two UConn near-misses, Lindell took a crossing pass from teammate Brian Parker and slammed the ball into the net from ten yards out. For Lindell, it was his team-leading sixth goal of the year, while the assist was Parker's third.

One minute later, UMass just missed tying the score at one when Huskie goalkeeper Brian Hall stopped Ray Cuhna at the goal line. UMass would have no better chances for the rest of the game, as UConn controlled possession and continued to test UMass goalie John Gruber. The Minutemen "played well individually, but not well as a team," said Gettler. Gruber finished with nine saves of dazzling variety for UMass. Most impressive of those was a stop of a breakaway chance by UConn's Mike Saunders. Huskie keeper Hall stopped nine shots.

UMmass' best chances of the afternoon came late in the first half. Andrew Bird sent a crossing pass through the air from the right to Tom Novajasky, who headed a shot high at goal. Hall leapt up and tipped the ball over the crossbar, saving a sure goal for UMass. Novajasky had another chance five minutes later, but his high drive from 25 yards away met the same fate. Gettler singled out Novajasky for his excellent play after the game.

"The first half was ours," Gettler said. "But we're not finishing, and one goal stands up against us. We were good, but not good enough."

The men's soccer team was shut down by Connecticut's impenetrable defensive unit yesterday in a 1-0 match.

The Minutemen, now 2-9-3, next host Atlantic-10 opponent St. Joseph's at 3 p.m. on Friday on the Hill. While UMass, 1-3-2 in the A-10, is not eliminated from the running for the A-10 tournament, their chances are slim. They must beat both St. Joseph's and Rutgers, and hope for a series of losses and ties between West Virginia, Temple and George Washington to gain fourth place and a tournament seat.

Beating Rutgers may present a problem for UMass, however. The Scarlet Knights defeated the top team in the country, UCLA (2-1) and will clinch the top spot in the A-10 with a tie or a victory. Rutgers is 6-1-1 at home, where the Minutemen will face them Oct. 26.

Women's soccer hosts Rhody

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

A healthy mental attitude can carry you through a shitty day.

Today may not be shitty but let us face it, these guys are tired. And who can blame them?

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team has played three top 20 teams in the last five days and they have only faltered once — by tieing then No. 10 Brown (1-1).

Now UMass is at slot 10 in the national polls and first in New England. Today they host Rhode Island at 3:30 p.m. on Upper Boyden Field.

"I really admire our people," Rudy said of the injured and perpetually sick athletes — seniors Kim Montgomery and Becky Bonzanno have been hampered by persistent colds. "They're hard workers 100 percent of the time."

The Rams are on a three-game losing streak, posting a 5-6 record overall, 3-5 in New England. Their wins have been against Army (2-1), Maine (3-1), Franklin Pierce (4-1), with shutouts against Stonybrook (1-0) and Holy Cross (2-0).

Connecticut (5-0), Brown (4-0), New Hampshire (9-0), Yale (1-0), Hartford (7-0) and Rutgers (3-0) have successfully shut down URI, pulling them down to the bottom of the polls.

On paper, these guys have been outplayed. They are under par in both scoring and corner kicks as well as fouls and offsides.

This is the first season at URI for head coach Wendy Veeder (Cortland '83) and assistant Robert Ciarlo (New Hampshire College '88), which may or may not be a factor in the team's organizational abilities.

UMass coach Jim Rudy, however, said they should not be underestimated. He cited junior Lynn Douglas and senior Kim Murowski as two of Rhody's key players. He also said they have a defense that comes out of the back.

Douglas and sophomore Eileen Ganzhorn have seven points for the season, leading the Rams. In 26 shots on goal, Douglas has completed three goals and one assist. Ganzhorn has netted two goals and three assists in 17 tries.

Other offensive factors include freshmen Gabrielle Riley and Jennifer Paradis who have two goals and one assist for five points. Although Riley has only seven shots on goal, she averages two goals per game. Paradis has taken 17 shots on goal and averages one goal per game.

Unfortunately for UMass, keeper Skye Eddy has a badly bruised left hand and Briana Scurry has back problems.

Eddy's injury was sustained in Tuesday's play, while Scurry's back problems are a result of wear and tear of heavy training, according to Rudy.

Boy do we feel stupid Sincere apologies from the sports desk and sports information office to April Kater for not staying abreast of her career points.

Kater broke the school's career point mark against Brown this past weekend. In her collegiate career, she has 35 goals and 19 assists for 89 points. So far this season she leads the Reds in scoring with six goals and one assist for 13 points.

Previous records were held by Debra Belkin ('84-'87) 31-23-85 and Catherine Spence ('84-'87) 33-19-85.

Other current teammates with impressive numbers include senior Sue Gaudette and sophomore Kim Eynard who both have eight points. Starting every UMass game, Gaudette has taken 32 shots on goal for three goals and two assists. In nine games, Eynard has taken 24 shots on goal, connecting four goals.

Sophomore Lisa Mickelson leads the team in assists with three and has taken 24 shots on goal. Junior Michele Woodside (25), senior Robin Runstein (15) and sophomore Holly Helmuth (14) have put their share of balls near the net.

Rudy On the NCAAs: Connecticut looks to be the Reds' most demanding game left in New England . . . UConn is the Reds' last home game as well as the last New England match . . . against common opponents, UConn holds a 4-2-1 record against UMass' 5-2-1 record . . .

UConn (No. 15) has yet to face Hartford (No. 13), Wisconsin-Madison (tied at No. 4 with Santa Barbara) and Colorado College (No. 6) . . . Hartford (6-5-2) is ranked No. 13, Wisconsin (12-1-1) is fifth and Colorado (10-1-1) is sixth . . .

UMass tied Hartford (1-1) and lost to Wisconsin (1-0) . . . in last year's playoff activities UMass lost to Colorado (5-2) in the NCAA quarter finals . . .

Field hockey meets Dartmouth

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team travels to New Hampshire today to take on Dartmouth. The Minutewomen will bring with them an overall record of 10-4 and a great deal of confidence after three consecutive victories against top 20 teams.

Meanwhile, Dartmouth has been struggling this season as they enter the match with a 2-7-1 overall record and winless in the Ivy League at 0-3-1.

Nonetheless, Dartmouth should not be taken lightly.

"We really don't know what to expect. Traditionally, Dartmouth has always been a pain in our necks," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "They get up for the tough teams. They play out of their minds, so they're kind of scary in that respect."

The Minutewomen defense and goalie Philippa Scott must contain Dartmouth's scoring threat, senior forward Laurie Khelokian. Khelokian leads the Big Green with 9 goals and 1 assist in 10 games. Scott has allowed only 9 goals this season, an average of 1.5 per game, while compiling 92 saves. Dartmouth goalie Tina Rosenblum has allowed an average of 2.1 goals per game.

The dominating Minutewomen offense, averaging 2.2 goals per game, are led by senior forward Mara Frattasio. Frattasio had a goal and two assists in Tuesday's match against Springfield College to bring her season total to 9 goals and 5 assists.

"The most difficult part about playing Dartmouth is just not to let down," said Hixon. "We must continue what we've been doing. We've got to get on the board early and often."

O-posiT I V E

A positively enjoyable evening

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Staff

O Positive became a unit in 1984; the original five members — lead vocalist Dave Herlihy, guitarists Alan Petitti and Dave Martin, bassist David Ingham and drummer Alex Lob — have survived the past six years without a personnel change.

Petitti, Ingham and Lob were practicing in a basement in Brighton, Mass., when Herlihy (then with a band called Chapter 12) began stopping by and joining in on their sessions on a regular basis. Martin started as their soundman, but wound up on guitar. The band's name came from a radio ad for a local blood bank.

"We decided that we wanted to really do it," Herlihy says. "Music has really limitless possibilities. If you can conceive of an effect — whether it's fear or sadness or whatever — you can produce it. Music is used for such base purposes. Cars, girls. I like cars and I like girls, but I want to do more than what's just easy."

O Positive certainly can't be accused of taking the easy way out. They originally planned to introduce themselves by way of a compilation of Boston-area bands called Seven Vinyl Virgins, but circumstances caused them to abandon the idea and raise the money to go it alone.

"Before we could get it together [the compilation]," Herlihy recalls, "a lot of the bands lost their 'vinyl virginity.' That's when we decided to record our own album. We'd play 15 gigs, go into the studio for one night, and blow all the money. Then we'd have to gig for another month-and-a-half just to get back into the studio again."

In October 1985, O Positive released their first EP, Only Breathing, on Throbbing Lobster Records. The EP sold nearly 20,000 copies, brought them extensive college radio airplay and in 1986 earned the band a Boston Music Award for their single, "With You."

Cloud Factory, their first full-length album, was released on Link Records in 1987. The album went top-10 on the Rolling Stone alternative charts.

This year, O Positive released their major label debut (Epic), ToyBoatToyBoatToyBoat. The album has earned them extensive national recognition.

"It's always been a climb," Herlihy explains. "We'll do carpentry and odd jobs, but we don't really have day jobs. Our philosophy has been to make a little less money and do what we believe in. We'll follow our hearts, and hopefully the wallets will follow.

"I hope we have a long career to explore whatever occurs to us, because the best part of it is stumbling upon the unexpected."

Tribe, who scored their first radio hit in 1987 with their demo, "Abort," will open the show. Lead singer Janet LaValley, whose vocal range has been described as "somewhere between the operatic drama of Lene Lovich and the knuckle-in-the-face power of Chrissie Hynde," won "Outstanding Female Vocalist" at last year's Boston Music Awards.

O Positive and Tribe will be playing the Bluewall on Saturday, Oct. 20. The show is sponsored by the Union Program Council. Tickets are $5 for UMass students and $7 for the general public. There will be a cash bar for those with proper ID. Doors open at 8 p.m.

Bob Mould barges his way into Pearl Street

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

I will go to Sunday night's Bob Mould concert with a twinge of fear in my heart and two cotton balls in my pocket.

I saw Mould in concert on Halloween night a year ago after he released his first solo album, Workbook, which he played in its entirety on stage.

Compared to the complex hardcore generated by Mould in the late 1980s as part of Husker Du, Workbook is Garfunkelesque stuff, full of acoustic 12-string guitars and carefully layered vocals.

Yet on stage in an open ballroom, Mould transformed the material into something ferocious and loud. Very loud.

Intricate, thoughtful songwriting, performed with a hardcore attitude, was an intriguing mix, and Workbook hooked in lots of fans, such as myself, who couldn't bring themselves to buy thrash such as Husker Du, but appreciated Mould's first solo step in a more listenable direction.

Mould is now touring in support of his latest album, Black Sheets of Rain, which is "relentlessly angry and dramatically more energetic than Workbook.

While classic pop songwriting and serious lyrics remain at center stage, Mould screams his way through Black Sheets of Rain as if trying to be heard above the din of his own guitar, the bass of Tony Maimone (from Pere Ubu), and crash-happy drummer Anton Fier (of the Golden Palominos).

"Sacrifice/Let There be Peace," "One Good Reason," "Stop Your Crying," and the title track, "Black Sheets of Rain," are particularly violent, and if Mould, Maimone and Fier take them up a notch in concert, it will be deafening.

Hence, the cotton balls.

Also last fall, in performance, Mould was intense, in the sincere, humorless sense of the word. Five minutes into the set, Mould's short hair was matted on his forehead and his shirt was soaked from sweat.

During the guitar solo that closed "Wishing Well," the second track on Workbook, Mould's eyes rolled back in his head and his neck and shoulders shook. Several times during the show, Mould took ordinary songs beyond the range of hearing with spastic, escalating guitar solos that backed the crowd away from the amplifier stacks.

Hence, the fear in my heart.

Black Sheets of Rain is a response to the exhilaration of playing Workbook live, Mould said. Last fall's tour ended a two-year absence from live performing, dating back to the not-too-civil break up of Husker Du.

"Seeing how people reacted to Workbook live and the things that charged them up got me going in this direction," Mould explained.

"When you're writing songs, you go with where you're at at the time. If you're feeling loud, that's what you should write. It just seems appropriate now to be more aggressive . . . There's no point in not pushing yourself."

Bob Mould and Ultra Vivid Scene will play Pearl Street in Northampton on Sunday, Oct. 21. Doors open at 8 p.m. Tickets are $10. Those 18-and-over are welcome.

UMass Marching Band hits Giant status

By JULIE LIVINGSTONE
Collegian Staff

The strains of music you ordinarily hear on your way across campus between 4:40 p.m. and 6 p.m. have grown more intense over these past few weeks and that's directly linked to the Meadowlands in New Jersey.

The University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band has been preparing for their performance during half-time at Sunday's game between the Phoenix Cardinals and the New York Giants.

Tom Hannum, assistant director of the Band explains that the opportunity was a combination of three things: fate, self-ascribed luck and a friend of a friend.

"Paul Caliendo, a band director in N.J. who has seen me do some workshops and saw the band perform a few years ago, is a big supporter of the Meadowlands. His friend Tom Powers is in charge of promotions and recommended to him that the UMass band play."

Hannum said he received a call last spring asking whether they would be interested in playing. He said at that point they were hoping for this chance because the band was scheduled to play at the UMass/University of Delaware game and the Meadowlands would fit in perfectly with the return trip to Amherst.

"I guess it's a matter of some luck, but mostly I think you create your own," Hannum said.

With 300 band members, a lot of energy has been invested in the trip. Band and color guard, plus a staff of 12 will be traveling to N.J. for the weekend.

They will leave Amherst at 7:30 a.m. on Friday to arrive in Delaware for a mass practice with several other high school bands, they will then play for the UMass/Delaware half-time and then it's on to Giants.

"We will be premiering our 'Phantom of the Opera' presentation, as well as three others — 'St. Louis Blues,' 'Canto Del Vienito,' and 'Bandstand Boogie.' The whole thing should last about 10 minutes. There'll be a post-game performance as well," Hannum said.

Band members raised the money for the trip through magazine sales which they began during the last week of August, more intimately known to them as "Band Camp."

Hannum has been involved with the UMass Marching Band for 10 years total, four of which he was a teaching assistant working on his graduate degree and the last six of which he has been Assistant Director. He claims it is one of the best bands he has worked with.

"There are many qualities about this band that leads many people to say it is our best. The people who are involved are still enthusiastic and we just keep getting better at bit by bit," Hannum said.

The Phoenix-New York Giants game will be televised on CBS starting at 4 p.m.

It's a beautiful day to visit the Neighborhoods

By DANIELLE DOWLING

When I was a kid, I hated Mr. Rogers.

Now that I'm older I can better appreciate the humor that can be found in his geeky neighborhood, but at the tender age of three I was under the impression that Mr. Rogers was nothing more than a dork. I have shared this opinion with my friends and have found that they too felt that Mr. Rogers was the nerd from hell.

I have also found that there's this strange stigma attached to anything that could be remotely associated with Mr. Rogers. Perhaps that's why the Neighborhoods have never made it out of cult status into lucrative success, since there exists a direct correlation between the group's moniker and horrific, childhood nightmares of nerdiness.

It was the late 1970s in Boston when drummer Mike Quaglia and guitarist Dave Minehan, inspired by their obsession for the punk rock scene, decided to form the first incarnation of the Neighborhoods. They soon became one of Boston's most popular acts. In 1979, they won WBCN's first "Rock and Roll Rumble" and subsequently released their debut single "Prettiest Girl," which sold over 10,000 copies.

Seeing bands like Robin Lane and the Chartbusters, Nervous Eaters and the Rings getting dropped just as quickly as they were signed, the group waited for the perfect offer. But despite many major label demo sessions, the Neighborhoods never obtained their set goal and disbanded a few years later.

In an interview with Musician Magazine, Minehan explained, "One A and R guy nurtured a relationship with us for months. But I was there when he met with his seniors in New York. This vice president came in, sat down for a minute, listened and said 'Nah,' and just walked off. A couple of years of that caused the band to break up."

In 1983, the group resurfaced, adding bassist Lee Harrington to their line-up. The newly improved line-up put together a collection of songs entitled Real Stories which evolved into the EP released in 1984, Fire is Coming. In 1986, they finally released their debut LP, The High Hard One, on Restless Records. The album was met with critical acclaim and hit the top-20 on college radio charts across the country.

The group left Restless in 1987 to join the newly formed Emergo label. They released their second album, Reptile Men, and followed this up with extensive touring, opening for such established acts as David Bowie and Aerosmith. Bowie had named Reptile Men as one of his favorite albums, which led to their opening slot at Sullivan Stadium, and Aerosmith guitarist Brad Whitford, a long-time fan of the group, produced their recent release on Emergo, Hoodwinked.

In an interview with Rock Bill, Harrington claimed that the Neighborhoods' future consists of "world domination." But maybe they should change their name first.

The Neighborhoods play Pearl Street on Friday, Oct. 19. The show starts at 8:30 p.m.

Duffey offers support, solutions to EWC

By TRYSTAN SKEIGH
Collegian Correspondent

President-Chancellor Duffey expressed strong support and solutions to recent cuts to the Everywoman's Center during a two-and-a-half-hour forum Wednesday with students.

Duffey addressed the issue at length in response to one of the evening's final questions. He made the suggestion that the program should look toward the other four colleges for support, in addition to fighting on campus for alumni funding.

"First of all, I know those EWC programs are important . . . graduating women have told me how important the EWC was to their experience here . . . these programs have reached as far as Northampton, and I have heard from South Hadley and Holyoke as well," Duffey stated.

Stressing that the EWC needs to explore different sources of funding, Duffey said that nevertheless, he would be "willing to see fees go up and some support restored" to protect some of EWC's programs.

"[The EWC] is a very special part of this University . . . I hope this University can return to the more ideal place that it was . . . it's crippled right now . . . being less responsive to the needs of the community and to students," he said. "I don't see it happening through state aid in the immediate future."

Twice during questioning, Duffey expressed support for the EWC trying to find alternative funds, first suggesting that funding be sought from UMass alumni and the Five College program.

"I would be glad to personally contribute to this effort," he added.

Duffey again mentioned his support for EWC fund-raising efforts, stating that "Maybe you and I and others should try to get together and fill that gap through some other means . . . Someone mentioned fund raising . . . I would be willing to seek someone to come on campus and help us put that together."

Carol Wallace, Program Director of the EWC, said yesterday she was pleased at Duffey's support of the EWC.

"Basically, it's encouraging to know the Chancellor understands the importance of our services and that he supports our ability to continue providing the services we have provided."

"I would be thrilled to have the Chancellor's support in identifying sources of external funding. I would like to take him up on his offer to help secure more alumni support . . . This has been something we've been interested in," she said. "I would like to work with him to develop a campaign where Alums could designate a part of their donations to the EWC."

Wallace supported Duffey's idea of seeking Five-College support for EWC. "We are very interested in exploring the process of getting Five College financial support. We think it's great the Chancellor supports these efforts."

"We serve the Five College area and the wider community," she said.

Israeli gov't forms group to find truth

One landmark in the Old City of Jerusalem is sacred to both religions, Judaism and Islam. The Jews refer to it as the Western, or Wailing Wall, and the Muslims refer to it as Haram al-Sharif, or Noble Sanctuary.

NEWS ANALYSIS

For years, "Temple Mount Faithful," the Israeli right-wing fringe group, has been advocating the building of the Third Temple at the holy sight, and it incurred opposition from the populace as well as the Israeli authorities.

Several days before Oct. 8, a day of the Sukkoth celebration commemorating "the Feast of Tabernacle," the Israeli Supreme Court barred "The Faithful (a Jewish group)" from the compound area, refusing to grant "Jewish radicals" permission to lay the foundation for the cornerstone of the Third Temple, according to The New York Times. (10/10/90)

On Oct. 8, "more than 3,000 Palestinians outside the [Al Aqsa] Mosque rioted, raining stones and bottles on Jewish worshippers."(Ibid) At the end of the day, 19 (according to Israeli sources) or 21 (according to Palestinian sources) Palestinians were killed by Israeli soldiers.

Possible veto angers minorities

Bush's promise to reject civil rights bill protested

WASHINGTON D.C. (AP) — Civil rights forces say President Bush will unleash widespread anger among minorities and women if he carries out his promise to veto a job discrimination bill on grounds it would encourage hiring quotas.

"If the president vetoes the civil rights act, there will be a firestorm of protest," civil rights advocate Ralph Neas said Wednesday after the House approved the bill, 273-154, and sent it to the president.

Support fell just short of the two-thirds margin sponsors would need to override a veto. It was the second such disappointment for civil rights forces in as many days.

The Senate approved the bill Tuesday but also was a handful of votes short of a veto-proof margin.

Bush is expected to veto the measure and return it to Capitol Hill with an alternative version. The chances of winning approval for an alternative version this year appeared all but nil.

The measure is aimed at overturning six job discrimination rulings that created a furor when the Supreme Court issued them last year.

It would ban racial harassment in the workplace and allow punitive damages in the most serious discrimination cases.

The fiercest disputes, however, have come over fine print changing complex rules on how job discrimination cases would decided. They would make it easier for minorities to win lawsuits and harder for employers to defend themselves.

Bush said Tuesday in a letter to Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., he would be "compelled to veto" the bill because it would force employers to adopt hiring quotas.

The measure says it does not "require or encourage" the use of quotas, but critics say employers would feel so vulnerable to lawsuits that they would turn to quotas as a ready-made defense.

"It is easy for employers to hide behind this false hue and cry of quotas," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., "But anyone who takes an independent and objective look at this bill will see at a glance that the quota argument is a sham."

Business critics of the bill were plainly in an upbeat mood. U.S. Chamber of Commerce official Frederick J. Krebs issued a statement saying the bill "balkanizes and tribalizes our nation rather than addressing the real problems facing many minorities today — education and drugs.

But Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a prominent civil rights leader during the 1960s, wrote a note to Bush recalling that he had been "beaten and jailed more than 40 times. Why? Because I dared to exercise my rights as an American citizen and I happen to be Black."

"As one who has tasted the bitter fruit of racism and been victimized by discrimination and racial violence, I appeal to you to sign the civil rights act of 1990," Lewis said. "It is the right thing for you to do."

Students making racist claims document charges against admin.

By CHRIS MUTHER

Students charging administration at the University of Massachusetts with racism in their decision to cut two departments in the School of Education said yesterday they have data to back up their accusations.

Last Thursday, the Faculty Senate announced 14 departments which were slated for possible elimination or reduction, including Staff Development and Organizational Development in the School of Education.

Evon Walters, a second year master's student in the Staff Development program said student research has shown the elimination of the programs go against the University's mission statement proposed during the late 60s.

"The committee [that choose the marked programs] has failed to recognize the set of accomplishments [of the programs] which are in line with the stated mission and goals of the University and the Commonwealth," he said.

Walters said the student research shows the two programs have a graduate student enrollment of over 100 students, with almost half of those minorities.

"These African American, Hispanic, Asian and other minority students represent a very large part of our University's commitment to diversity," he said.

He said there are currently five Black faculty slated for termination, adding this number represents almost 15 percent of the tenured Black faculty currently at the University.

Last week Marylin Haring-Hidore, dean of the School of Education refuted charges of racism, stating her school leads the University in respect to diversity.

Provost O'Brien has also rejected charges of racism in the administration's proposal to eliminate those programs. He added there was no racial bias "in any way against minorities." He said there were "no targets."

the compound were trying to prevent "The Faithful' from erecting a cornerstone on Haram al-Sharif. The New York Times claimed Palestinians gathered in the mosque started hurling rocks at the Jewish worshippers after they were attacked by the Israeli security forces.

The "Faithful," however, were not in the compound when the rioting began. "'Mount Faithful' did stage a small, symbolic march near the mosque, but not inside the compound early Monday morning."(New York Times Ibid.)

According to the United Press International (10/8/90,) on the day of the riot, the "Faithful" were not within the walls of the Old City where Temple Mount is located.

According to The Washington Post article (10/14/90) which reconstructed the incident at the Western Wall, violence began when a large Palestinian crowd poured out of al-Aqsa mosque toward a small group of Israeli border policemen and a second Palestinian throng charged the small police station on Temple Mount where two patrolmen were stationed. Having driven the policemen off the Mount, the Post said Palestinian rioters began stoning Jewish worshipers at the Western Wall.

The New York Times on (10/9/90) said: "Only a few dozen paramilitary police officers, unprepared and ill-equipped, were on hand when more than 3,000 Palestinians on the plaza outside the mosque rioted, raining stones and bottles on Jewish worshipers by the Western Wall below; worshipers and tourists scattered in panic and confusion."

The article further stated that "[Israeli] Police asserted that Palestinians started three concurrent assaults on Israeli targets, throwing rocks over the top of the Western Wall, attacking a nearby police station and stoning cars driving behind the compound . . . Civilian and military policemen stormed the gates to the compound but initially retreated under a hail of missiles."

Following that, the Times said, "a helicopter fired tear gas and rubber bullets into the compound, and after the police forced the gates open, they used live ammunition, rubber bullets and tear gas to disperse the Palestinians inside."

Several sources speculated that the Palestinian rioting was agitated in advance for political purposes.

Kuwait's United Nations Ambassador Al-Sabah said that the Temple Mount incident was "an attempt on the part of Saddam Hussein and the PLO [Palestinian Liberation Organization] to divert attention from the Kuwait crisis . . . We can see the instructions coming out from Saddam Hussein to the people there and received by his collaborators to escalate the violence." (Cable News Network, 10/9/90)

Major General Turkl Nefai, commander of a Saudi armored brigade at the Kuwaiti front, said the Jerusalem incident is "the reaction of Palestinian people to the call of the PLO leadership in their race to be the first to demonstrate their support of Saddam Hussein." (Atlanta Journal and Constitution, 10/10/90)

According to the memorandum from the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee, shortly before the incident, the PLO's Unified National Leadership of the Intifada issued the following call to the Palestinians: "O Stone-throwing heroes, O stone-throwing generals: Rush to help your kinfold in the steadfast [Gaza] Strip and scorch the earth under the feet of the occupiers." (UNL Leaflet No. 62, issued in the territories on 10/1/90, quoted in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, 10/3/90.)

After the incident, "the underground leadership of the Palestinian uprising issued a leaflet calling on Palestinians to kill Israeli soldiers, settlers and the police," (NYT, 10/10/90.)

Yaakov Levi, Consul at the Israeli Consulate in Boston said in an interview yesterday that the intense criticism of the incident is intended to divert attention from inter-Arab strife, more recently the Syrian bombardment of Lebanon which started on Saturday.

He said yesterday 80 bodies of Christian and Muslim bodies were found near the Presidential Palace in Beirut, and Christians in Lebanon are escaping to a security zone in Israel.

"This raises the question on whether or not it is permissible to kill Arabs as long as Israeli's don't do it," Levi said.

Levi added that in the recent months, some 300 Palestinians have been executed by other Palestinians because of political and religious rivalries. The latest killing has been that of Walid Talbad, who was found hung two days ago in a refugee camp near East Jerusalem, Levi said.

Levi said an estimated 700 Palestinians have died in a confrontation [with the Israelis] since the Intifada started three years ago, although some reports claim that the number has risen to over a 1,000. According to the New York Times, there have been 793 Palestinian deaths so far. (10/10/90)

"Israel is committed to finding out what happened," Levi said, referring to the incident at the Temple Mount. The Israeli government has appointed a Commission of Inquiry which will conduct interviews with Palestinians and Jews and "reach a conclusion."

"The Commission will publish a written testimony by Palestinians and determine the truth of what happened," Levi said. "It will get underneath the truth as it has in the past. And at the end it will issue an honest verdict, even if Israel is the one to blame."

UM officials support release of crime stats

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts officials are generally supportive of a bill presently working its way through Congress that would required colleges and universities to release graduation and crime statistics on their campuses.

The measure originally began as a law aimed at colleges with large-scale athletic programs and low graduation rates. The bill was expanded by lawmakers to include the graduation rates of all students, since the federal government supports a great portion of higher education costs.

The legislation was then merged into campus crime reporting bill. The measure has been pushed through Congress largely by the actions of Constance and Howard Clery Jr., whose daughter was murdered in her dormitory room at Lehigh University.

Dr. Arthur Hilson, director of public safety, said he is in favor of the bill since it will allow him to share information with other colleges in order to see trends.

"It will let us look at patterns — when you work in a vacuum you don't see everything," he said. "[With this bill] we will all get a better sense of what is out in the field."

But Hilson said he is concerned about the method used to collect the data. He said without a proper understanding of the method interpretation by students and parents may be flawed.

"My one problem with the bill is how the data is interpreted," he said. "One department may place, say, all assaults in the same category, another may place assaults and aggravated assaults in different categories."

Hilson also said the figures could be slated. "Sometimes data statistics are self-serving," he said.

Senator Edward Kennedy [D-Mass.], a sponsor of the bill, told the New York Times that he considers the measure remedial. "Sunlight is the best disinfectant. Once colleges begin disclosing this vital information, those with the poorest records will be under the greatest pressure to improve."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson said this week he is also supportive of crime and graduation reporting bill if it is "done right and honestly."

He said published crime and graduation figures would remind students to operate "smart" on campus but, like Hilson, worries about the interpretation of the figures.

"I hope that figures would not be overstated and that people would have a perspective of what the figures mean," he said. "Just placing the data out cold would be harmful."

"It's also important to realize where the figures are coming from," he said. "[At the University] the crime rate represents a middle-class neighborhood but we still have a crime problem."

The bill originally called for colleges to release by July 1, 1993 annual figures to the secretary of education, who would then have issued them. The conference committee version of bill, however, requires colleges to give the information to applicants and employees.

Madson said he feels the part of the bill pertaining to graduation statistics for students and especially athletes to be one of the more important portions of the legislation.

"I played ball in college and enjoyed it and learned from it," he said. "But ball should be secondary."

University of Massachusetts football coach Jim Reid was unavailable for comment.

Campus Design and Copy opens

Student entrepreneurs create an entirely student-run business

By MAURA CANAVAN
Collegian Correspondent

A group of student entrepreneurs have joined together this semester, creating a business run entirely by students on campus.

Campus Design and Copy, located in the Student Union at the University of Massachusetts, is a student-run co-op offering a variety of services. This student-run business specializes in high-quality copying, laser printing, typesetting and computer graphics, according to spokesperson Jason Price.

Under a new name this semester, Campus Design and Copy was originally SNPS, a student notes printing service. Student Government Association Communications joined the business this semester, specializing in printing flyers and resumes, using a variety of computer graphics.

Campus Design and Copy uses a sophisticated Xerox Marathon Copier, two MacIntosh Computers and a laser printer. Three students working in the business, Tim Duffy, Ralph Seaman and Lynne Chinigo, are artists knowledgeable in the area of computer graphics, Price said.

"We charge substantially less than our competitors and we're more convenient for students," said Price, an economics major and head of the Academic Business Program. The program, beginning Spring semester 1991, will be offering a binding service for course packets and reserved readings.

"Our goal is to start off with 50 professors. Professors like the fact that we are a co-op," said Price.

Resident Student Organizations such as the Student Senate and the Union Program Council, frequently use Campus Design and Copy. Price said, "They're very loyal to us and they get priority when they come in."

"We have always been the cheapest at five cents a copy," Price said. "Our profits pay off our debts and go right back into the business. We would definitely like more walk-ins. A lot of people on campus don't know about us."

LGBA's seats in jeopardy at BOG

By LAVINIA GAMMON
Collegian Staff

Elimination of the two appointed LGBA seats on the Board of Governors was proposed at last night's meeting, by Governor Ted Maravelias and Ed Corrigan, BOG vice president.

"There has been legal precedence that giving board seats on the basis of sex is unconstitutional. I also feel that it is patently un-American (to be given a seat)," Governor Maravelias said in an interview following the meeting.

He closed with, "I mean nothing personal by this. Despite their sexual orientation, they are bright, intelligent people."

If this amendment passes Maravelias does not intend to remove the present LBGA governors. He hopes to see the seats open for elected governors by next fall.

When questioned on why he chose to address only the LBGA seats when the Third World caucus and Abilities Unlimited also hold appointed, not elected seats, Maravelias answered, "I'm choosing to address the LBGA."

Governor Silver, one of the two LBGA governors, said she was "alarmed" by this proposal.

"I feel we (the board) need to be cohesive right now. This board is not to be used as a political tool, but to serve the needs of the students. I am surprised that they have not targeted the other appointed groups. This is a blatant homophobic act. I would encourage anyone concerned about discrimination to contact Maravelias, or Corrigan

Landers strives to reduce gov't bureaucracy and spending

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Unlike most state representative incumbents, Rep. Patrick Landers [D-First Hampden District] was elected when the Massachusetts Miracle had ended and the budget crunch began to take its toll on state agencies and programs.

By entering the Legislature in a time of crisis, Landers said he developed ideas to rethink state spending to avoid what he calls "a stop-start sort of policy." His present campaign platform is to reduce governmental bureaucracy and to moderate legislative spending.

Landers graduated from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in 1986. As an alumni of public higher education, he said the budget cuts to state schools and universities has been "extremely short-sighted" since the state economy relies on trained workers.

Landers was specially elected in 1987 after former Rep. Bill Moriarty died of cancer. Landers was a legislative aide of the late Moriarty.

"State revenues expand and contract to the business cycle," he said. "It makes no sense to set up a program and then pull the rug out when the cycle turns over."

During the six years of the Massachusetts Miracle, Landers said legislators over-budgeted based on inflated revenue projections and proceeded to spend on an excessive agenda. He said this budget over-extention has caused the state government in the last few years to use a bonded debt service for operational budget costs instead of capital construction.

"This kind of debt is like taking a second mortgage on a home to pay for groceries," he said. "For the first time, we're relying on borrowing to plug the gaps in the budget."

The best way to use debt service to aid the economy is through capital construction which would simultaneously create jobs while improving roads and bridges, he said. Funding education is also important as industries are attracted to states with a large educated and skilled workforce.

He attributed part of the fiscal crisis to dwindling numbers of computer and health care industries within Massachusetts. The deficit was also caused by the state government filling in financial gaps caused by reduced federal spending and Proposition 2 1/2, the cap on local property taxes.

Landers said the legislature should consider that a small shift in the business cycle seriously changes revenues. If a government spends moderately, then the budget will survive the business cycle, he said.

By diversifying and broadening the state tax base through a sales tax on service, the volatility of economic recessions will have less of an impact on state revenues, he said.

Landers does not support the tax rollback question three because he said it will worsen the state deficit as well as seriously impacting public higher education and human services.

"Wall Street analysts don't feel that the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition would stimulate the economy," he said. "If question three passes, Massachusetts will be inheriting a legacy of debt into the 21st century."

The CLT petition, question three on the Nov. 6 ballot, calls for a state tax and fee rollback to 1988 levels and has been estimated to cut 40 percent from discretionary funds.

He supported restoring cuts made to UMass in the 1990 budget year.

"THIS YEAR at the UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS at AMHERST"

Copies of 'THIS YEAR' are now available at the University Store, for $5.00 each. This publication was prepared by Student Affairs Special Services as an orientation piece for new students. Because of many requests from other members of the campus community, excess copies are being made available at this time for general distribution

Among the features are sections on transportation, food services, Campus Center services, student employment, student activities and organizations, student government, athletics, campus services(e.g. ATM's, copy centers, health services), academic resources, the arts, and a calendar/diary preprinted with key events in the academic and social calendar.

"UNDERGRADUATE RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES"

A limited number of additional copies of "Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities" are available from the Information Data Bank (second floor lobby of Whitmore).

Among the features included are the academic calendar; Code of Student Conduct; Alcohol Beverage Policy; Picketing Code; academic regulations and policies; dispute resolution; Affirmative Action and Non-Discrimination Policy Statement; and key telephone numbers.

Reforms key to new budget

Editor's note: This is second of a two-part series about the state fiscal crisis form State Rep. Stan Rosenberg.

State health care spending also covers medical insurance for state employees. Here, too, medical costs are driving the price tag up, even though there are fewer state employees today and the state recently began collecting co-payments from members of health maintenance organizations, who were previously exempted.

What can be done? Medicaid needs a complete review of who qualifies for assistance and which health care options we provide. Massachusetts, generous in these areas, must bring itself in line with other states' guidelines for eligibility and services and must consider strategies used elsewhere, including co-payments.

Structural reforms will help, too. Visits to the doctor, emergency room care and nursing homes are all mandated-budget expenses, but home care is not and suffers repeated cuts, despite the fact home care is cheaper and more efficient type of care.

We can also encourage greater use of long-term care insurance and home-sharing. We can consolidate the agencies which oversee health care and reduce unnecessary government regulation. Adopting some combination of these proposals, after an open and public debate, will go a long way toward controlling health care costs.

Debt Service. Over the past decade, a reasonable slice of the state budget was spent on paying back money we borrowed for major construction and land-protection projects. Especially during the 1980s, when Massachusetts' credit rating was the best possible and we borrowed at extremely attractive rates, this made sense.

It not only invested in long-term educational, environmental, and public works projects, but at the same time created thousands of construction jobs, boosting the economy in the short term.

More recently, however, the state borrowed extensively for a less-acceptable reason — to pay off annual budget deficits. Worse, because of its budget problem, Massachusetts' credit rating took a nosedive. We must pay off this short-term debt, bring our obligations back under control, regain a top-notch credit rating and properly manage all future state borrowing.

State pension system. Unfortunately, high pension costs are due to the tragic mismanagement of the state pension system over the forty-year period. On top of that, the number of retired state workers is growing rapidly.

Since the state neglected its contributions to the pension system, we're paying off the liability now and keeping pace with the growing ranks of retired employees. We're new in the third-year of a strict timeline for repaying the pension debt. Sticking to this schedule is critical to keeping pension costs manageable and guaranteeing retired public employees the pensions they have earned and paid for.

The MBTA and other public transportation systems. Public transportation, much of it for Boston-area communities, is the final major budget expense. The oldest system in the country, the "T" needs costly improvements.

But while investing in public transportation, we must demand better management and efficiency. Capital spending at the MBTA should be capped and the Legislature should start appropriating the state's subsidy to the "T" every year, instead of reimbursing the authority for expenses.

Massachusetts needs to control each of these areas of spending through innovative, and sometimes controversial, reforms. Only through strict management will the "budget-busters" stop growing three or four times faster than revenues, forcing us time and again to cut education, human services, law enforcement, and environmental protection programs.

They say question three sends a message — and it does. But the message says only one thing: "We're mad." It carries no suggestions, no new ideas, no answers. Question three fails to address the most important job facing state government today — taking charge of the largest and fastest-growing parts of our budget. This is the key to controlling state spending throughout this decade and returning to a time when every priority and every critical service gets a fair share of our tax dollars.

Negative propaganda in coverage

On Sunday, Sept. 23, 1990 at approximately 2:15 a.m., Lorenzo Sutton was involved in a hit-and-run accident which left him in a coma in the intensive care unit at Bay State Hospital.

He has suffered serious injuries to his head. At this point, the doctors are waiting for him to regain consciousness before any predictions as to the extent of his injuries can be made.

Lorenzo was hit by a woman the police later identified as Jean Kokoska, 21, a UMass junior. The details of the evening are still being investigated, however, we know according to reports Jean Kokoska did hit Sutton and did not stop to assist him. Whether she called later and admitted to the incident is irrelevant.

The Collegian has covered the incident since and all the articles about this unfortunate incident have been assumptions and at times incorrect. I am concerned with negative reporting.

The headline in the Collegian on Friday, Sept. 28, 1990 states, "Sutton possibly involved in a fight before the accident." This article states "Police are investigating the theory that Sutton was being chased at the time he was struck in the traveler's lane of North Pleasant Street . . ." After speaking with many students, it seemed clear the Collegian is trying to make it sound as if Sutton is at fault for his own situation.

Did it matter if he was running in or near the street? I was taught in drivers education the pedestrian always has the right of way. The law states if someone is in an accident they must always stop and stay at the scene until police arrive.

Another issue which disturbs me in this entire investigation is the fact that police did not release this woman's name for days after the incident. I understand the possible concern for her safety — Lorenzo is very well-known and liked on this campus. Hopefully no one would jeopardize the police investigation by harassing this woman. However, the woman's name should have been released by Amherst police immediately and not days after. This only added to the suspicious nature of this case.

Another report carried by the Collegian concerned the apparent rape of a man. The Collegian gave names of the suspect and informed readers of his country of origin. The offender is a Black man, and his name was published. The police did not initially release Jean Kokoska's name in order to protect her from possible threat of harm. Why wasn't the same protection given to this Black man who allegedly committed the rape? Even in this unfortunate situation we again confront an issue of racism!

For those interested there is a fund set up to help Lorenzo Sutton and his family with expenses the hospital stay has incurred, contributions will be greatly appreciated.

Beginning of a life of sexual harassment?

So, I encountered sexual harassment for the first time in my life this weekend. It's the same old boring story, but this time it happened to me, this time I had to be the one to confront the statistic come to life.

A friend of mine was walking me home Saturday night. It was a great night, if you remember, raining and warm; great weather to walk in, to splash each other and laugh in.

We were walking along that empty stretch by the Fine Arts Center on North Pleasant Street when a car swerved to stop beside us. There were two men in the car. I have a startled image of their leering, drunk faces shouting rather obvious abuse.

My friend is a thoroughly nice, mild-mannered guy. It pissed him off when they shouted stupid comments about my breasts and his virility, but we kept on walking, telling them in a reasonable tone of voice to hush up.

But these guys were committed to being unpleasant. The driver stopped the car and staggered out, walking towards us, swearing and trying to pick a fight with my friend.

Suddenly we were reduced to the classic situation where the good guy fights the belligerent, irrational bad guy to protect the woman's honor.

I was in the position of pulling my friend away from the fight (protecting everyone's manliness in the process, of course), and hoping that the two men would leave.

It is awful to be dependent on hope. They peeled out, swerving at us as they drove past, shouting and hooting. Drunk driving and sexual harassment — what really admirable college students.

So, the same boring story. Except that it happened to me. Except that it was me in that vulnerable position, it was me that had no means to defend myself if they'd really meant what they were shouting.

It's totally scary to think that this time it ended okay, this time they left. But, what if I'd been walking alone? I can't imagine.

What's enraging is that I was on safe ground. I was walking along a busy, well-lit street that I walk every day. What gives these men the power to shatter my sense of security?

Every woman can expect to be sexually harassed five times in her life time. Is this incident only the beginning for me?

Administration negligent in eliminating programs

The administration at the University is considering the abolishment of some crucial programs on campus.

I am asking them to reconsider this negligent act against the Black community, student population, faculty and the Commonwealth. These programs are directed toward public service and are composed of a high number of Black students and faculty.

However they do not realize the possible consequences:

1) Over $1 million in direct grants and almost $2 million in related outside student support received by Staff Development alone. If this program is abolished, this resource would be eliminated.

2) The implied contract between present students and the administration may be severed causing legal recourse.

3) The discontent generated by the establishment of a process of the firing of supposedly "tenured" faculty.

4) The implications of the abolishment of areas with a proportionally high number of Black students and faculty.

5) The expense of considerable litigation which may be incurred by the University arising from these actions.

6) The public reaction to a state university involved in such action in an election year.

Unless this is not changed, then we are all taking a part in the deterioration of one of the greatest public universities.

Taking extra shots not entirely mindless

Meredith O'Brien's column ("An extra shot for a giggle," Oct. 16) accused me of "brushing on a little make-up, dressing up and using cans of hairspray to fluff up my hair," to win $20 at Midnight Madness. I was the one who shot three baskets, but I'm not a "mindless sex object" but a "female whose number was selected."

By chance, my number was called and I proceeded to the basketball court. I was nervous, there were a couple of thousand people watching me. I took a shot at the basket and missed.

I started to walk off the court. Rich Tettemer asked if I should be given a second. The crowd said "yes." I took another shot and missed. I was extremely embarrassed.

My supposed "dramatic body motions" were merely me covering my face from embarrassment. I started to walk off the court again when Tettemer asked the audience if I should be allowed another.

The consensus this time was no, with people yelling "boo" and singing "hey, hey goodbye." They were far from encouraging me to take another shot. But, being a poor college student, when offered a third chance to win $20, I figured "Why not?"

When the shot did not go in, I felt guilty taking the money. When Tettemer offered me the "crisp green one," I refused by saying, "No. I don't deserve it." This is the only thing I said to him while on the court. I did not flirt or beg to get another shot. Insisted I take the money, I figured it was no big deal.

I was shocked when I read the Collegian, it was such a big deal. What started off as simple entertainment was twisted into a shameful sexist act. I did not bat my eyelashes, toss my hair, talk like an idiot or whine as described in Tuesday's paper.

I have never formed opinions about people before getting to know them first. O'Brien doesn't know me from a hole in the wall yet she had formed an opinion of me. She reduces me to a manipulative coquette and elevates herself to a feminist crusader. Her article is clearly anti-feminist. Feminism works against stereotyping women, but the editorial did nothing but stereotype me on the basis of how I look.

Committee to bring diverse acts to campus

By SHANE DONALDSON
Collegian Correspondent

After five years of dormancy, the Union Program Council has decided to revive the Duke Ellington Committee, a group that focuses on bringing African American and Third World performers to campus.

Junior Art Major and UPC staff member, Keith Campbell, has been asked by UPC to re-establish the DEC in the face of renewed interest in the program.

Campbell said there is a definite need for the group within UPC to attract rap, jazz and rhythm and blues acts.

"I think UPC needs a different, but equal organization to help out in that aspect," he said. "They can work with rock and other types of music, but they need advice with rhythm and blues."

The DEC died out as a result of a lack of internal support within UPC, Campbell explained. He added that the DEC did not have the same back-up suppport as other UPC committees such as hospitality and security, which made the shows more difficult to stage.

The last show the group produced was the Morris Day, Run DMC, L.L. Cool J triple bill in 1985.

Presently, Campbell is in the process of researching the old DEC and laying the groundwork for the group to become fully operational by next semester.

"I'm reading a lot about the old DEC so I can have an idea of what it was," Cambell said.

Campbell also mentioned that the committee will be producing the DEC Rap Spectacular in conjunction with the Black Mass Communications Project, on Nov. 2 in the Student Union Ballroom. The show will feature the X-Clan, Poor Righteous Teachers and D-Nice.

Campell, who is also the music director for BMCP, said if anyone is interested in the committee and the re-development process, he could definitely use the help.

"What I'm trying to do is find people who are interested in bringing the DEC back to what it was — a full faction of UPC," Campbell said. "I'm going to need a lot of help and a lot of committment."

Anyone interested in the DEC should contact Campbell in the UPC office in 406 Student Union, or attend weekly UPC meetings. Meetings are held on Tuesdays at 6:30; to find out locations, contact the UPC office.

Shanghai Symphony speaks musical volumes

By STEVEN SCHWANKERT
Collegian Correspondent

REVIEW

If music is the international language, then the Shanghai Symphony Orchestra spoke with complete fluency Wednesday night at the Fine Arts Center. Conducted by Hou Runyu, the orchestra filled the hall with the sounds of both Eastern and Western composers alike.

The evening began with Hector Berlioz's "Roman Carnival Overture, Opus 9," which began slowly, but finished with a festive air that would have pleased Caesar. However, it was the second selection, "Fantasy for Ehru and Orchestra, 'Legend of the Lake,'" that made this performance unique and unlikely to be duplicated by a Western Orchestra.

Written by Ho Zhanhoa, this piece incorporates the ehru, a traditional Chinese instrument that consists of two metal strings and a wooden resonating box. It is bowed like Western stringed instruments, and produces a distinctly Chinese violin-like sound.

Accompanying the Shanghai Symphony Orchestra on its current tour of the United States is Jiang Jianhua, whose ehru playing is featured. The music beautifully conveys the story of lovers torn apart by their families in a theme found frequently in Chinese literature. The composition ends sadly as the main character of the story, Mo Chou, drowns herself in the lake which now bears her name. Although I have seen other performances by Chinese orchestras that made use of traditional Chinese instruments, never before did the two types intertwine so well, forming a seamless music cloth. Jiang Jianhau's impassioned playing was most certainly a contributing factor to this, where the orchestra complemented the erhu and vice versa.

After a short intermission, the orchestra returned to begin its most extensive selection of the night, Sergei Rachmaninoff's "Symphony No. 2 in E minor, Opus 27," one that took almost 50 minutes to perform. Beginning in a dark and melancholy fashion, the piece built to a flourishing ending. It is said that after Rachimaninoff wrote the Second Symphony, he realized that not every audience would appreciate it due to its length, so he approved several deletions. However, the Orchestra performed it in its entirety, and the relatively small but enthusiastic crowd at the FAC seemed to enjoy it quite thoroughly.

The orchestra returned for its encore, "Stars and Stripes Forever" by the great American composer John Philip Souza, an obvious tribute to their American audiences on this current tour. The opening measures brought smiles to the faces of the audience members, not expecting an evening of significant works to end on such a light-hearted note.

It was a privilege to have the Shanghai Symphony Orchestra at the Fine Arts Center. Some may remember that a Chinese acrobatic troupe, also from Shanghai, was scheduled to appear at the FAC, but because of the political situation that arose after the Tiananmen Square massacre and a reduction in the number of visas issued for foreign travel, the troupe was denied permission to tour the United States. It is a welcome sign to see that China is once again permitting its various artists to go abroad and give performances for foreign audiences.

Blakey's death marks end of a jazz era

By BILL ROSENBLATT
Collegian Staff

Valley Jazz

Art Blakey, legendary jazz drummer, mentor and bandleader, died earlier this week at age 71. The jazz world mourns the loss, to be sure. Yet Blakey's passing differs from other recent deaths of jazz veterans in an important way: Blakey was more than just a historical influence on the way today's musicians play; he was a profound factor in shaping today's jazz scene. His death means the end of an era.

Blakey participated in the bebop revolution of the 1940s and formed the original Jazz Messengers in the 50s. His self-described mission was to keep his band fresh by hiring young musicians for a couple of years, letting them go on to their own (often successful) careers, and hiring a new round of young blood.

Many dozens of musicians passed through Blakey's groups and received his onstage tutelage over the years. The list reads like a who's-who of post-1950s jazz and is far too long to enumerate here; suffice it to say that this enormous aggregation of talent speaks as highly for the musicians themselves as it does for Blakey's ability to identify and nurture young potential. It has been said that the Blakey pedigree is tantamount to a Harvard diploma in law or medicine.

Blakey's role as a springboard for young musicians' careers has been especially vital in recent years: most of the many young prodigies dominating the current scene got their starts with Blakey. In fact, it could be argued that Blakey is as much of a factor behind today's emphasis on neo-traditionalism as record company marketing hype, because Blakey plays (and teaches) a style of music that has not really changed since the late 1950s.

Now the big question is this: what will happen to the influx of new players now that there is no Art Blakey to catapult them into the public eye? Who, if anyone, will replace him, and what styles of music will they represent? These questions will be resolved in due course over the next few years — and the answers will determine the future of jazz.

There are a few possible Blakey "replacements" evident today, including Betty Carter, Jack DeJohnette and Tony Williams. All are masters, all currently lead bands that consist of young players, and all (especially Carter and DeJohnette) regularly revamp their personnel. Also, DeJohnette and Williams are drummers who, like Blakey, constantly kick their soloists' posteriors into overdrive.

But there ends the similarity. All three are a generation younger than Blakey (and thus one instead of two generations removed from their young proteges), and all play music of more modern influence. Both Williams and DeJohnette are veterans of Miles Davis' advanced 1960s bands as well as the early-70s fusion scene; Carter is a vocalist who took jazz singing past Billie Holliday and Ella Fitzgerald by incorporating 60s "free" influences.

While Williams' and Carter's current music is firmly rooted in post-bop verities, DeJohnette's Special Edition band is the most modernist of all. In particular, the current M-BASE collective in Brooklyn consists mainly of Special Edition alumni; their music, like DeJohnette's, includes liberal amounts of electronics and funk/hip-hop influences. In other words, the young players who come out of these three bands will be trained in music more up-to-date than the pre-60s rehashings of most current Blakey alumni. As a result, the music will change, and many of today's neotraditionalists will fade out of the limelight.

The idea of apprenticeship in jazz, whereby a young musician learns his or her craft via "on-the-job training" with an established master, did not originate with Art Blakey; in fact, it has roots in timeless African tradition. So it is likely to continue, despite the increasing role conservatories are playing in the training of jazz musicians. Therefore we should look to middle-generation musicians like Carter, DeJohnette and Williams to carry on Blakey's time-honored role as the master who taught by example on the bandstand and the shaper of jazz to come.

CORRECTION

Yesterday in the arts calendar, we incorrectly noted that there would be a matinee of Torch Song Trilogy on Sunday, Oct. 21. There will be no matinee. Performances of Torch Song Trilogy will run Thursday, Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m. The show is produced by Student Valley Productions. Local band 'new and improved'

UMass' One Eyed Jake has returned this year new and improved, according to one band member.

One Eyed Jake spent this summer in Florida in the Daytona and Orlando beach areas playing for vacationers.

Improvements include the addition of a trumpet on "Rock Bottom Horn Section."

One Eyed Jake will be sure to play all the old favorites: "East Side Boys," "Funky Brew" and "Lonely Senorita." They'll introduce new songs to you, sure to be great hits some day.

One Eyed Jake plays the Hadley Pub on Oct. 20 and Sheehan's Cafe on Oct. 25.

10,000 Maniacs

On November 17, 10,000 Maniacs will be performing at the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are on sale now at the Fine Arts Center Box Office. Prices are $14 for UMass students and $17 for the general public.

innings. What? He hit a home run in Game two? He also K'd twice, lost three easy outs in the lights, and ended up 1-5. McGwire started to come out of his slumber just in time to face Jack Armstrong, a pitcher who in his first playoff appearance retired the first seven batters he faced, striking out of both Canseco and McGwire.

I must give a little credit to Ricky Henderson though. He, like Wade Boggs in the ALCS, is doing everything he can for his club. For his sake, I hope the Reds don't sweep.

Tonight's game will showcase Mike Moore for the A's vs. Tom Browning of the Reds. They are both consistent pitchers, but the advantage is Moore's, because his back is against the wall.

If you get the chance to catch some of the action this weekend, you should be in for a good ol' time. Sit back, crack open a beer of your choice, and watch as the Reds capture the World Series crown. I have a feeling Oakland is doomed.

We pioneered the portable pension. We invented the variable annuity. In 1988, we created the CREF Money Market Account to give you more flexibility. And in March of this year, we introduced two new accounts, the CREF Bond Market Account and the CREF Social Choice Account, to let you shape and diversify your retirement investments even further.

At TIAA-CREF, we believe that steady incremental growth over the long term is the best way to build retirement income. This investment philosophy has worked well for over seventy years, and has provided retirement income for hundreds of thousands of people like you.

THE KEYS TO RETIREMENT INVESTING

Security, growth, and diversity are the keys to sound retirement investing: security, so the resources are sure to be there when it's time to retire; growth, so you'll have the income you need for the kind of retirement you want; and diversity to help protect you against volatility and to let you benefit from the strengths of several types of investments.

TIAA AND CREF—A SMART COMBINATION

TIAA's traditional annuity provides maximum safety, guaranteeing your principal and a specified interest rate. It also gives you the opportunity for growth through dividends—which we've declared every year for 41 years. In fact, TIAA's net earned rate has beaten the industry average for every one of those years.[1]

With CREF's variable annuity, you can choose from four different investment accounts, all managed by experts who understand the long-term strategies essential to sound retirement planning.

THE FIRST CHOICE IN EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

The TIAA-CREF retirement system is specifically designed for people in education and research. You may move from one institution to another many times in your career, so your annuities move with you to any of over 4,200 institutions with TIAA-CREF retirement plans. You need financial security, so the system provides retirement income you cannot outlive. Plus, the TIAA-CREF system offers:

Performance: The CREF Stock Account outperformed the mutual fund industry averages for the last one-, five-, and ten-year periods. The CREF Money Market Account has shown excellent returns since its inception, outperforming the industry average since May of 1988.[2]

Responsiveness: Our experienced counselors are ready to answer your questions. Call our toll-free numbers for performance figures or information about your personal annuity accumulations.

Strength: Your future is protected by the largest private retirement system in the world. We have done so well, for so many, for so long, that we currently manage over $80 billion in assets.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Exercise restraint with your money. Wishful thinking or delusions of grandeur should be laughed off. Practical needs may overrule your desire for recreation tonight.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Do not allow a selfish or arrogant attitude to lead to a confrontation. Those who are acting for the benefit of others, as well as themselves, will win. A romantic relationship seems magical!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Tensions at work should not be allowed to disrupt positive romantic feelings. Lasting financial security linked to a golden career opportunity. Return phone calls promptly.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your creative talents and expertise in a specific area could be the deciding factor in your securing valuable allies. Seek associates whose strengths complement your own.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Avoid getting into disputes with your employer. Take an adaptable, wait-and-see approach. Unexpected developments could change your outlook. Accept someone's offer to arbitrate a disagreement.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Important support can be obtained from higher-ups. Your powers of persuasion are at a peak during the next two days — use them wisely. Enjoy a new romance.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You may be able to earn some extra cash now. Just avoid becoming involved in business ventures that will irritate higher-ups. Take things easy where romance is concerned. Refrain from making demands.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You may be tempted to splurge while shopping. Don't do it! Make a list of what you need and stick to it. Concentration may be difficult at work. Persevere. Dine out tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): There is new emphasis on salesmanship today. Your powers of persuasion are great. Look for ways to cut expenses. Young people will reaquire your attention. Try not to overextend yourself.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Pay closer attention to financial affairs. It may be necessary to seek expert advice. A platonic relationship changes. Postpone making a commitment until you are certain of your feelings.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A great day for negotiating contracts. Deal with insurance and tax matters. Bargains can be found by those who do some comparison shopping. Look at an IRA or money market fund.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Open your eyes! Acknowledge the affections of a friend who is attracted to you. An old friend knows what's going on. Go ahead and make your needs known. Social and romantic trends look great.

Rugby hosts Williams

By DAVE SZPILA
Collegian Corespondent

The University of Massachusetts rugby club will do battle with Williams College Saturday at 12:30 p.m. at the rugby field behind Southwest.

UMass is looking to improve its 3-2 and gain a spot in the New England Championships, which will be held in two weeks here at UMass.

Last week UMass beat the University of Vermont 20-0. Standouts in the match were Brian Donovan (2 tries), Bobby Vigneaux (1 try), Jerry Hunt (2 conversions) and Mark Dowling, who replaced the injured Brian Nicole and scored a try in his first A side game.

Last week's match had all the aspects a rugby match should: passing, kicking, scoring, and a little extra pushing and shoving.

UVM started the festivities with a high hit out of bounds. This move started a shouting match that soon lead to a brief scuffle between the two clubs. When play resumed, UMass kept on the offensive for all but a few minutes, leaving UVM with its backs to the wall for the rest of the match.

Last week's B-side had some highlights as well. Craig Gallivan was tossed out of the game for throwing a forearm. The referee who tossed Gallivan was the UVM head coach, who volunteered to officiate the game. The UMass B-side won easily, 11-3.

This weekend brings on a new opponent, however, and UMass coach Doc Laurence, who has returned from wine country, said he has his team ready.

Williams will be a tough opponent for UMass. The Williams club is 4-1, having lost to Norwich last week.

A-10 tourney beckons XC teams

• Men chase top spot

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team will travel to Van Cortland Park in New York City this weekend to compete in the Atlantic 10 Championships Saturday.

UMass coach Ken O'brien said he expects his team, which has consistently finished among the top three or four teams in the meet in the past, to be battling for the top spot again this year.

UMass finished third last year behind Penn State and West Virginia, and O'Brien said he expects Penn State will be the team to beat this year as well.

"I think that we should be battling Penn State for first, but you have to give serious consideration to West Virginia and St. Joseph's too," O'Brien said. "I think on an average day we should beat [West Virginia and St. Joseph's], but I felt that way last year and we finished third to West Virginia."

As they have all season, seniors Jon Corso and Tom Degnan will likely lead the way for UMass.

• Women shorthanded

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

Saturday the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team will travel to the Bronx in New York City to compete in the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Coach Julie LaFreniere said she is confident her team will be vying for one of the top spots in the meet. "If our team runs to our potential then we should finish third," said LaFreniere. "Last year we ran poorly and finished third, but the conference has improved this year."

Penn State is favored to win the meet this year, with West Virginia a close second.

"It will be extremely close," said LaFreniere. "St. Joseph's looks to be tough, and Rutgers is improved and will be a factor. Although we beat Rhode Island last week, it will be much closer this Saturday."

LaFreniere has decided to leave Cathy Crocker behind this weekend. Crocker, a steady performer throughout the season, may be suffering from fatigue and LaFreniere said she does not want to risk injury.

Polo to see familiar faces

By JOE DEGLORIA
Collegian Correspondent

After a successful and uplifting effort at the Eastern Varsity Tournament last weekend, the University of Massachusetts water polo team hopes to continue its winning ways as it heads back to Brown to compete in a round-robin tournament this weekend.

UMass is affiliated with the New England Intercollegiate Water Polo Association, and NEIWP teams that will compete this weekend include Harvard, Brown, Boston College, Yale, and MIT.

UMass is 1-5 and ranked No. 16 in the nation. This weekend's action will be important in deciding the seedings for postseason play. The New England Championships will be played the first week of November, followed by the Eastern and National Championships.

UMass will play Yale in the first game of this weekend's tournament, and even though coach Russ Yarworth said does not anticipate any trouble, he wants his team to go into the game with an aggressive attitude.

"We must not look past Yale and pick up any bad habits," Yarworth said. "We have to play well and come out strong and put them away early. We play Harvard the next morning and we have to be up for such a team."

The Harvard game is the first of two big games on Saturday for UMass, which beat Harvard 11-10 last weekend in an overtime thriller.

Yarworth said he knows Harvard, the No. 16 ranked team in the country, will be ready to avenge the loss.

"I am making a defensive adjustment to prevent outside scoring. Harvard scored a lot of garbage goals last time and we want to stop that," Yarworth said.

UMass plays Brown Saturday at 3:30 p.m. UMass played Brown, ranked No. 12, last weekend and lost, 12-7.

Yarworth said he hopes that he can take away the hole man as a important part of the Brown offense and fend off the high scoring team.

UMass will face Boston college Sunday at 9 a.m. UMass played BC in the the beginning of the season and the Eagles gave the Minutemen trouble; UMass prevailed 10-9.

Yarworth said he believes his team shouldn't have had such a tough time against BC and he hopes his team will maintain its intensity for Sunday's games, regardless of what happens Saturday.

Sunday also has UMass battling MIT at 3 p.m.

Men's soccer's last home gasp

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team plays its last home game of the year today at 3 p.m. against St. Joseph's at Upper Boyden Field.

Just how nice would a win be for the Minutemen? UMass' slim hopes of making the Atlantic 10 tournament depend on a win. This is the last home game for senior Pete McEvoy. The Minutemen haven't won in eleven games.

All would be well taken care of by beating the Hawks today.

UMass midfielder Tom Novajasky stressed how important this game is to the Minutemen.

"This is a big game for us," said Novajasky. "We need to come out and fight hard, and play tough defense. If we don't win and find out later that we could've made the tournament if we had beat St. Joseph's, that would be devastating."

St. Joseph's, 1-3 in the A-10 and 6-7 overall, is on a three-game winning streak. The Hawks' best asset might be goalkeeper Eric Bowman, who is seventh among Atlantic 10 goalies with a 2.07 goals-against average. Bowman has 104 saves and two shutouts.

On offense, Donald D'Ambra leads the Hawks with 12 points (five goals, two assists). Besides D'Ambra, the Hawks don't appear to be much of a scoring machine; they have 19 goals, only five more than UMass.

For the Minutemen, Pete Armenti, the A-10's top goalkeeper with an 0.27 goals-against average, will start in goal. Darren Stone will return to the backfield after a one-game NCAA-mandated suspension following his fifth yellow card. Justin Edelman will also return, having recovered sufficiently from a sprained ankle.

Arron Zandy, however, is still recovering from a concussion and will probably not play.

The ties that bind: UMass' best chance at fourth place in the A-10, and a tournament birth, is if George Washington, Temple and West Virginia tie each other in the season's closing weeks.

Wins by these teams would put the Minutemen out of reach.

Women's soccer defeats URI, 4-1

By ADRIENNE MATT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team knocked down the Rhode Island Rams in a 4-1 decision yesterday at Upper Boyden Field in the last of the Reds' home games. They will face their last New England game this Sunday at Connecticut.

UMass had the chance to shut down Rhody almost completely by holding their offense at bay for all of the first half and up until 1:44 remaining in the game.

"We would have liked to shut them down," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "But I'll give them credit, they fought to the end."

The game was delayed due in part to a confused URI bus driver who took the team south on Highway 395 from Kingston. The Rams arrived one hour late. The referees were good sports and stayed until URI showed.

UMass initiated the scoring drive 10 minutes into the game when freshman Paula Wilkins connected with senior Robin Runstein for a smartly executed goal.

Seventeen minutes later, sophomore Kim Eynard passed to senior Sue Gaudette in the box for a clean shot to the bottom left corner of the net, upping UMass to 2-0.

Eynard then shot another bullet at the net which was deemed an 'own goal' (not awarded to any player but given to the UMass team by fault of the URI defense). The score remained 3-0 to the half.

"We didn't mark well," said first-year coach Wendy Veeder of URI's first half play. She said not stretching out hampered the team but not to the point of a 3-0 deficit. "We weren't doing the basics."

The Rams posed some offensive threats but UMass stayed in control and maintained possession for the majority of the game. However, UMass could not capitalize on their offensive chances in the second half. The Rams had come out of the halftime huddle warmed up an determined to fight.

Halfway through the second half, cloudy skies darkened the field and made play more difficult.

Junior Tracy Arwood connected with sophomore Carrie Koeper who chipped a shot to the top of the net for UMass' fourth goal with 11 minutes remaining.

The Rams first and only retaliation came within two minutes remaining when junior Lynn Douglas lofted a shot into the bottom right corner of the net, assisted by freshman Gabrielle Riley.

"This was a good game concidering this is our fourth game in six days," said Rudy. Now UConn is in the wings.

Field hockey wins

Dartmouth beat 2-0

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

HANOVER, N.H. — Yesterday in the land of the Green, where even the houses are trimmed with green, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team dispatched the Dartmouth Big Green 2-0, extending its winning streak to four games.

UMass forward Jean Salisbury provided No. 8 ranked UMass with all the scoring it needed in the first half, as she deflected a Dawn Trumbauer shot into an empty net.

In what is becoming UMass' best threat on the penalty corner, Trumbauer blasted a shot which went conveniently onto the stick of Salisbury. Salisbury slipped it by Dartmouth goalie Lynn Duffy, who was drawn out of position.

Salisbury, who was inserted into the starting lineup a week a ago, scored her second goal of the game on a rebound of a penalty corner shot by Beth Thornton with 17 minutes remaining, sealing the win.

"Dartmouth traditionally is a very difficult game," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "They're our spoilers. They play a very unorganized style, they play for broke, and they don't really care what happens so they are very reckless.

"They've always given us fits."

After Salisbury's first goal, UMass settled back and played a steady game, attacking when the opportunity arose, and playing solid defense. Dartmouth had several chances to score, but could not put one past UMass goalie Phillipa Scott, who recorded a shutout.

"It's not the kind of game that I worry about. We need just one more [goal] than they have at the end," Hixon said.

UMass takes its 11-4 record to Rhode Island Saturday, where the Minutewomen will face the A-10 Rams.

"This has been a long ten days," Hixon said of a stretch in which her team has played five games, two against top twenty teams. "With the intensity that we had to play at over the weekend [against Penn St. and New Hampshire], we haven't really had time to recover. So we wanted to come home safe with the win," Hixon said.

Down two, A's are cooked

Chang! Look out Oakland, the Reds are on a roll.

The new and improved Big Red Machine has taken the first two World Series games doesn't look ready to ease up. Sure the series is moving to Oakland, and you might even say that the A's are due, but unless the big bats start going, Oakland is doomed. The A's have left more than twenty men on base in the first two games and the team has already thrown its two best hurlers in Dave Stewart, the four-inning, 9.00 ERA king, and Bob Welch. The Reds, on the other hand, keep marchin' on.

Dave Szpila

Billy Hatcher, Cincinnati's center fielder, is a perfect 7-7 at the plate and he has reached base every time he has been up in the series. The Nasty Boys, Rob Dibble and Randy Myers, have done the closing job extremely well, with Myers getting two K's in one inning of work in game one, and Dibble working two innings of shutout ball in game two, throwing nothing but heat. Eric Davis has come alive with a shot over the wall in game one and four RBI in all. Chris Sabo is hitting and Joe Oliver, the Reds catcher, delivered a pair of hits in Game two, the second of which drove in the winning run in the bottom of the tenth off, this makes me laugh, the Eck!

All kidding aside for now though. The Reds are on the road and things will get a little tougher. Unless of course Jose 'Cantseco' continues to sleep between

Football team fights history at Delaware

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team has never beaten Delaware, dating back 14 games to 1958.

There. It's been said. As the Minutemen and the Fightin' Blue Hens prepare to meet Saturday in Newark (1 p.m.), the No. 1 topic of conversation is the streak, and not that UMass is playing for first place in the Yankee Conference and to protect its undefeated 4-0-1 record.

Are there any explanations for 32 years of bad luck?

"I don't think there are any jinxes," senior UMass cornerback Allen Williams said. "There were times in the past we've had them beaten and it just didn't work out."

Coach Jim Reid, who has been a part of 10 losses during the streak as both an assistant and head coach, takes an even sunnier view of things.

"I think it's fun," said Reid. "It's been good press all week."

The Minutemen enter the game as the No. 7 ranked team in Division 1-AA and tied with New Hampshire for first place in the Yankee Conference, at 4-0.

Since tying Holy Cross on opening day, the Minutemen have rolled to four straight wins. UMass has the top running game (282 yards per game) and two of the five top rushers in the Yankee Conference in quarterback Gary Wilkos (96.2 yards per game) and tialback John Johnson (84.8).

The UMass defense is ranked among the three stingiest in the league in total yards allowed, and has given up less than 14 points a game on average.

Numbers aside, a healthy mental attitude is what gives this UMass team the best chance of snapping Delaware's spell, Williams said.

"This team is really put together well," Williams said. "The chemistry is unbelievable. Everybody acts as a family, and everybody really wants to beat them."

The Minuteman defense has been thinned by injuries, however. Cornerback Don Caparotti and defensive tackle Steve Brothers both sprained ankles last week in the mud against Connecticut and will not play. Matt Tulley will likely give his slightly separated shoulder another week's rest, leaving inside linebacker duty to last week's Yankee Conference Rookie-of-the-Week, Greg Mattern.

And tackle Bill Durkin will cross over to fill in for tight end Ron Villone, who is suffering from a sore shoulder.

"We are not in great shape," Reid said.

Delaware enters off a 19-15 win over Villanova keyed by sophomore quarterback Bill Vergantino, who has posted Wilkos-like numbers out of coach Tubby Raymond's trademark wing-T offense this season. Vergantino leads Delaware in both rushing (103-361, 2 TD's) and passing (70-143 for 798 yards and 4 TD's).

Game notes: The game will be broadcast on WMUA 91.1 FM, WTTT 1430 AM and WSPR 1270 AM . . . Last week's win was Raymond's 200th.

Men's tennis wraps with win

Singles seal 6-3 defeat of Franklin Pierce

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team ended its season yesterday by defeating Franklin Pierce College 6-3 at Upper Boyden.

UMass didn't seem to be affected by a two week layoff, as the Minutemen came out strong. Franklin had played only two matches this season and won both, against Bentley and Division II powerhouse Lowell.

"I can't think of a better way to end the season than with a win," said UMass coach Manny Roberts. "Everybody played well."

UMass' No. 1 singles player, Barry Wadsworth, led the attack with a 6-3, 3-6, 6-1 win against Mehdi Belhassan. It was the second time Wadsworth has beaten Belhassan, who is ranked as a top 10 amateur player in Morocco.

No. 4 singles action was a battle between two exceptional freshmen, UMass' Tim Lipsky and Franklin's Jason Pierce. Pierce jumped out to an early lead, winning the first set 6-4. However, Lipsky fought back to take the remaining two sets 6-3, 6-4.

Meanwhile, Franklin's No. 2 player George Obidieguez, from Nigeria, trounced Minuteman Jeff Hechemy 6-3, 6-2, and No. 6 singles player Tadashi Hiraoka edged out UMass' Lenny Levine 7-5, 7-6 (7-0).

After Chuck Rubin's 4-6, 6-3, 6-4 loss to Franklin's Brent Hardy left UMass trailing 3-2, i[illegible] crucial for the Minutemen to win the remaining No. 3 singles match.

And the match proved to be the closest of the afternoon, as UMass' Richard Stone battled Franklin's Jason Forbes. Rubin escaped with a first set win 7-5, but lost the second set 6-7. With teammates who had already finished their singles matches cheering him on, Rubin elevated his game a notch in the third set to win 7-5.

Singles play left the match tied at three games, leaving the outcome in the hands of the doubles.

Wadsworth and Lipsky, fired up from their successful singles play, easily defeated Belhassan and Pierce. Up 4-3 in games, UMass looked toward the team of Hechemy and Stone to clinch the win, and the duo obliged with a 6-1, 6-2 thrashing of Obidieguez and Forbes.

Rubin and Matt Murphy teamed up to win 6-2, 6-2 to complete the doubles sweep

Area students: 'Pull forces out' of Mideast

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — About 45 students from the Five College Area Saturday traveled by bus to Boston, where they joined more than 1,000 people to march in protest of the presense of the United States in Saudi Arabia.

The demonstration, sponsored by the Coalition to Stop U.S. Intervention in the Middle East, was held simultaneously in more than 20 cities throughout the nation and the world, including New York City, NY, San Francisco, Calif., Dallas, TX, Minneapolis, Minn., Sydney, Australia, London, England, and Panama City, Panama.

Alexandra DiMontrichard, a junior at Hampshire College, said she attended the demonstration because, "I would like to see the U.S. avoid any military conflict. We wouldn't be here if we thought we couldn't stop it."

University of Massachusetts freshman Eric Nicholson said he attended the rally because he thinks the government has not adequately justified its presence in the Gulf.

Marcey Buchakjian, a freshman at Mt. Holyoke College, said she is angry that the U.S. has sent troops to Saudi Arabia. "I don't think we're there for the Kuwaiti people, but for selfish reasons," she said.

Andrea Tiglao, also a Mt. Holyoke freshman, said, "I want the U.S. to pull out. I want the U.S. to get the U.N. involved, not act as a single body, but look at the global issue."

Cyril Spiro, a sophomore at Hampshire College, said the U.S. government and its people should work to find a non-military solution. "There needs to be a re-directioning of our values of people in America. War should not be an option, much less the first."

Hampshire College sophomore Erik Harlick added, "We're not saying that we don't think the troops are not doing what they think right, but talk — there's got to be a better way to resolve it."

The coalition, which originated in New York City, is composed of several different groups, including trade unions, religious organizations, student groups, lesbian and gay organizations, disabled rights groups, AIDS activists, and anti-war groups.

"I think Oct. 20 will signify a new anti-war movement in this country — a multicultural, multi-issue fight," said Maureen Skehan, an organizer for the Coalition's New England chapter. Skehan said this movement will differ from previous anti-war movements, because "African American people, Latinos, Arab, Asian, and Native American people will be at the forefront, along with all other oppressed people."

Asian culture examined during Awareness Week

By ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

What is Asian? "Something more than what you see on T.V. commercials and Hollywood movies," said Professor Lucy Nguyen. This week students and community members all have the opportunity to discover a little something about Asia.

This week the University of Massachusetts will experience its first formal campus-wide "Asian Awareness Week."

There will be various activities during the week ranging from classical Indian music to a discussion on feminism in Vietnamese literature to a conference on Asian ethnocentricity.

"The intent of the Asian Awareness Week is to reveal all the uniqueness, beauty and richness within various Asian cultures," said Nguyen. "We want to learn from each other and to help the non-Asian communities overcome stereotypes of Asians and to learn the diversity among Asians," she said.

"You would be surprised by the number of Asian countries represented here at UMass," said Nguyen. "We have students from Pakistan and all across Asia to Japan," she said.

"Because the Asian community now has a cultural center students from different Asian cultures have a foundation from which they can present such an awareness week," said Nguyen.

The events this week are programmed to be educational, cultural and fun.

"People with the slightest curiosity and interesest should attend as many of the events as possible," Nguyen said. "This week is a part of the learning that takes place at a University," she said.

"The events are out of the classroom but they are just as important to the development of of one's education," said Nguyen.

"This Awareness Week is important for the Asian community," said Nguyen. "Asian students need to learn from and share each other's differences," she said.

"There are drastic differences between, for example, Indian and Cambodian cultures, but it's exactly these differences that make Asian cultures so diverse and beautiful," said Nguyen.

One event, a Vietnamese folk tale reading, will be given in Vietnamese as well as English.

"Students have put a lot of effort and energy into organizing the week and it's something that they're very proud of and excited about," Nguyen said.

The week will culminate with a dance party on Saturday night in the basement of Thatcher House.

The Asian Awareness Week is sponsored by the United Asia Cultural Center with support from Asian students and student organizations.

Panel to address harassment motives

By ALI WOOLWICH
Collegian Staff

The issue of harassment directed towards people of different races, sexual orientations, genders, religions, or ethnic identities will be addressed by a film and panel discussion sponsored by the psychology department today at 2:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 101.

The program, entitled "Turning Against and Hurting Others: The Role of Perpetrators, Passive Bystanders, and Allies," will feature the film The Life and Times of Harvey Milk, a documentary about the life of the first openly gay elected politician. The film will be followed at 4 p.m. by a panel presentation by Ervin Staub, of the psychology department, Bailey Jackson, of the School of Education, and Arlene Avakian, of the Women's Studies department.

According to an invitational letter sent to fraternities, residence directors, athletic coaches, the Reserve Officer Training Corps office, the Newman Center chaplain and numerous other departments and offices, "The program is, in large part, a response to the disruption of the anthropolgy class [ANTHRO 206] in which the film [The Life and Times of Harvey Milk] was shown during spring 1990. That incident was homophobic, a violation of the people in the class and a disruption of a basic mission of the University."

According to psychology department member Norman Simonson, one of the event's organizers, "It is vital for people who will never be victims of hate crimes to understand and stand up against acts of harassment."

Here is an overview of the events that led up to this forum:

- April 24, 1990 — Young Americans for Freedom hold a "Straight Pride" rally on the Student Union steps attended by more than 150 people, including gay, lesbian, bisexual and heterosexual ally students. A heated exchange ensued throughout the rally.
- Hours after the rally, a group of 10 to 15 men burst into Arthur Keene's "Culture through Film" class during a showing of the Harvey Milk documentary. Men blocked all the exits to the auditorium, while others positioned themselves in aisle seats, and about eight men stood on the stage at the front of the class. Keene left the projection booth and went toward the stage. At a shout of "Run boys! Run!" the men raced out of the auditorium. A student security patrol, seeing several men run from Thompson Hall, where the class was held, contacted

Abortion issue reemerges from a haze of worries

WASHINGTON (AP) — After taking a back seat to worries about taxes, the economy and the Middle East, abortion is re-emerging as a potentially decisive issue in the final days of the 1990 election season.

"It's one of the few issues that's still out there that distinguishes people," said Harrison Hickman, a pollster for abortion-rights causes.

"I would predict you'll see a lot of people using it at the last minute to try to push undecided voters."

Conventional political wisdom has held that abortion-rights candidates had the upper hand this year and that opponents of abortion were on the defensive after a 1989 Supreme Court ruling revived the issue. Electoral losses for abortion foes in 1989 contributed to that view.

Yet abortion hasn't proven to be the "silver bullet" for abortion-rights candidates, in the words of Democrat Donald Avenson, a pro-choice candidate for Iowa governor. And abortion opponents point to races where their candidates have stood firm and are leading — including governor's races in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and Iowa.

Commitment honored at EWC

Volunteers graduate from EWC's anti-violence program

By SARAH DEMASTER
Collegian Staff

Expressing hope despite recent budget cuts, directors of the Everywoman's Center's Counselor/Advocate and Educator/Advocate programs last week honored 20 women at the third bi-annual graduation ceremony of the EWC's Against Violence Against Women Programs.

"We are here to honor the commitment [of these women] and the completion of the 60-hour training," said Deb Levy, of the Counselor/Advocate Program. "Especially in this time of crisis, the tendency is not to be as giving. It is inspiring to see women who give of themselves.

"Without volunteers we couldn't do it," Levy added. "We can withstand cuts with their motivation." The EWC's Counseling and Outreach and Referral Programs have been cut this semester. A group of about 65 people, including friends, family, and roommates of the graduates, attended the ceremony, held in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts. In addition to diplomas and lit candles, the women were honored with speeches, poems and songs.

Levy said when she is asked why she does this work, she responds, "I find a lot of hope in it . . . I know we're making a difference. Watching women grow and heal is a privilege."

One woman Levy watched heal was keynote speaker Heather Finn, a former participant in the Counselor/Advocate Program and a survivor of sexual abuse.

Finn, now assistant director of the alumnae fund at Smith College, entered counseling at the EWC in the winter of 1989, after remembering she was sexually abused her junior year in high school in Alabama by her history teacher, who was also her debate coach.

Finn suppressed the incident until after she had entered college, become a counselor at the EWC, and had helped create the Smith Project on Sexual Harassment at Smith College. She first remembered her abuse when she returned to Alabama for a wedding.

"My recovery took a long time. I was assisted by many different women at the EWC," Finn said. "You women may not know it, but you will help them. Even if they don't come back for counseling, or hang up on the hotline, they're probably on [their] way to recovery.

Stacy Roth, of the Educator/Advocate Program, said, "It's good to have Finn as a tangible example, because I'm always asked how [the educators and counselors] will know if the word is getting out."

Pat Barrows, also of the Educator/Advocate program, jokingly referred to the training as "boot camp for advocates," because of the amount of information the women must acquire.

Barrows added, "The women learn the power of themselves and of other women. It's amazing — it's what keeps me going in this work."

The following are now Counselor/Advocates: Joanne Brown, Diane Crow, An Dominique Garcia, Barbara James, Anna Karlsson, Katherine Oscar, Arlene Gladden Reaves, Jean Ritchie, June H.L. Virgo, and Julie White.

The following women are now Educator/Advocates: Patti Buck, Debbie Butler, Jennifer Cannon, Deb Cooper, Alison Conn, Sarah Getoff, Becky O'Donnell, Kay Pfeiffer, Deborah Rose, and Jennifer Tyne.

CLT a 'tool of anger,' Healy says

Rep. Jay Healy

By KENDRA A. PRATT
Collegian Staff

On the campaign trail for his 11th legislative term, Rep. Jay Healy (R-First Franklin District) said state government should target wasteful spending, but the tax rollback petition on the November ballot misses the mark.

"Ballot question three is a tool for people to direct their anger," Healy said. "The question is whether it will solve the state's problems or is it just a club to punish the government?"

Ballot question three, commonly known as the Citizens for Limited Taxation petition, would rollback state tax and fee rates to 1988 levels if passed by voters on Nov. 6. Although legislators will make the final decisions on where the resulting cut of $1.2 billion from the budget will hit, Healy said the reductions will devastate state agencies on discretionary accounts such as human services, public higher education and roads and bridges.

Cutting discretionary accounts would not cut waste, but vital services that the state provides to Massachusetts residents, he said. Healy said he estimates that $200-300 million in state spending for "legal doorkeepers, press agents and patronage positions and low priority state spending" could be eliminated, like the $10 million the state has slated to invest into Greylock Glen, a project to build vacation homes for tourists in the Berkshires.

Even cuts such as these could never reach the degree of reduction which question three could create, he said.

"Question three would not just cut to the bone, but to the marrow," he said. "It calls for a severe, abrupt cut in a sluggish, declining economy."

Healy said public higher education is "a fundamental asset" of the state and the rounds of 4 percent cuts to the University of Massachusetts has created disaster. Administrators and legislators must now prioritize spending on programs, he said.

"When you start disassembling an educational institution, it takes years to replace the quality the school has obtained," he said. "I am very concerned with the morale at UMass which I consider a class institution with very good faculty."

In the 1990 budget session, Healy said he was "one of few Republicans" who supported an amendment to increase state funding of education by $20 million.

Healy said the state should consider a system of "means testing" to determine what a student should pay for tuition at a public institution based on parental income. State colleges and universities should have more control over their budgets and should be given incentives to save money by being able to invest the savings back into campus accounts.

"We ought to encourage monies to be kept locally through tuition retention instead of being allocated out of a monolithic state budget to put more accountability at the local level," he said. "There's no incentive for administrators to save money because then the state will cut the budget to the level that was saved."

The First Franklin District is partially comprised by the towns of Sunderland, Deerfield, Goshen, Whately and Montague.

Hunger still an 'epidemic' in US, Mass.

By MARC ELLIOTT
Collegian Correspondent

According to a recent Gallup poll, 13 percent of Americans were not able to buy food at some time during 1990, Harvard Professor Juliet Schor said Saturday at a talk at Hampshire College.

Schor, an economics professor at Harvard's Center for Popular Economics, spoke to a group of about 50 people, including food agency directors, food committee chairpersons, students, and concerned citizens at a talk about hunger in the 90s called "Beyond the Band-Aid," organized by the Northampton Survival Center.

Since 1974, the Gallup poll has been asking people if there has been any time during the past year that they did not have money to buy food, Schor said.

"The last time the Gallup poll did this was 1989," Schor said. "They found that on the national basis, on average, 13 percent of Americans said 'yes' to that question — there were times during the last year when they didn't have enough money to buy food for their families."

In what has been for a long time the world's richest country, said Schor, the U.S. now has at a minimum a sixth of the population struggling to get enough to eat.

Poverty and hunger in America is getting worse and many working families are making "poverty wages" because of economic and labor shifts, Schor said.

"There are more people below the poverty line and they are sinking farther from it," she said. "Even if they were working full-time, there are more people whose earnings don't lift them out of poverty."

The minimum wage earners in 1991, even after the increase to $4.25 per hour, are going to be doing worse than they were in 1967, she added.

The second speaker, Annette Rubin-Casas, is currently director of advocacy and programs for Project Bread, an organization that supports more than 300 soup kitchens, food pantries, homeless shelters, and other programs, including the largest one-day fundraiser against local hunger in America, the Walk for Hunger.

"Hunger in Massachusetts is beginning to look like an epidemic," Rubin-Casas said. "Over a half a million people in this state are going hungry. One out of five children, one out of two Black children, may go to bed hungry tonight."

The two speakers were introduced by Ben Wisner of the Luce Food Program at Hampshire College.

"World leaders have met in New York and endorsed the rights of the child," Wisner said. "At the same time, there's a food embargo against Iraq and the first to suffer will be the 500,000 children under five."

"And at the same time, tuberculosis and diptheria are resurgent and increasing after having been reduced over the last several decades in many parts of the world and also, as many of you are aware, in many parts of the communities in which you work."

After a question and answer period, mediated by Catherine D'Amato, director of the Western Massachusetts Food Bank, and a free buffet lunch, those attending the talk split up into groups to discuss strategy for eliminating hunger in the future.

Anyone wishing to contribute or volunteer time to the fight against local hunger should either call the Northampton Survival Center at 586-6564 or drop in at the center at 265 Prospect St.

Anti-war group forms; plans 'Books Not Bombs' campaign

By JEREMY LEVINSON
Collegian Staff

Students and faculty concerned with the possibility of war in the Middle East have formed an organization to educate the campus and protest U.S. intervention.

"War means death for many of us," said Masha Brown, an organizer with the Ad-Hoc Coalition Against War in the Middle East.

She said the group is working to "make people aware of the consequences of war," and amplify the voices of those who oppose war.

Brown said the Coalition plans on organizing rallies, including one today at noon on the Student Union steps, and other activities aimed at both educating people and voicing opposition to a war in the Middle East.

Organizers feel that the Bush Administration has ignored the true feelings Americans have about war, said Jason Rabinowitz, another Coalition organizer.

"Thousands are being locked out of education, jobs and a future, yet we may be asked to fight a war in which we have no interest," he said.

Rabinowitz said he believes that American oil companies have made record profits since gasoline and oil prices have skyrocketed.

He added, "It's clear who's really benefiting."

Brown said that the handling of the Persian Gulf Crisis reflects skewed priorities on the part of the U. S.

"The shift towards U.S. military aggression sets a standard that is antithetical to the real interests of the people of the United States and the world," she said.

The Coalition seems confident that the current crisis in public education and other social programs will make it easier for people to see the "obscenity of spending $50 billion dollars this year alone in the Persian Gulf."

Brown said, "Our generation has forgotten history. Vietnam wasn't that long ago. Hopefully our generation won't have to learn the hard way."

She charged that the Bush Administration is biding its time, until after Election Day.

"Once bodybags start coming back, that will reflect on George Bush," she said.

Organizers feel that the voices against a war in the Middle East will quickly become louder because, as one organizer put it, "Draft-age people are realizing that their blood is thicker than oil and oil profits."

The new organization will kick things off today with a "Books Not Bombs" rally on the Student Union steps at noon.

Parental consent laws kill

"When we begged the [Senate] Judiciary Committee to give women a reasonable doubt, not Souter, they turned a deaf ear. Let's never beg again!"

Ellie Smeal

These words have been ringing in my ears for almost two weeks now. I heard these words in Thompson Chapel at Amherst College when Ellie Smeal spoke to a few hundred people in a room filled with the portraits of men. Men. Not a single woman.

Gayle Long

I didn't notice this until a very astute young woman pointed this out to me as I waited for the lecture to begin. It was then I realized the importance of this lecture taking place in this room.

It was parental consent laws and women's rights which brought Ellie Smeal to Amherst. I heard not only her voice, but the voices of thousands of women who have died from an illegal abortion.

Ellie Smeal is involved with the Fund for a Feminist Majority. A former president of the National Organization for Women, she now sees the struggle for women's rights coming to a bitter end, after 20 years of pain, hardship and heartache.

With her was a man named Bill Bell. He had a story to tell as well. Ellie Smeal made shivers run up and down my spine about the realities of women's rights today — we may be facing the end of Roe v. Wade now that Souter has passed the Senate.

Bill Bell had a different story. It was a story of a family, who lost a child, Becky, to a nightmare — parental consent laws.

Becky was a bright and intelligent girl. When she found out she was pregnant, she couldn't get an abortion in Indiana because of parental consent. She found someone who would give her an illegal abortion and a week later, she was dead. Parental consent laws did not foster the family communication they are supposed to. They fostered death of an average teenager in America.

Although the claim is parents should know what their child is doing, do they really understand what these laws are about?

We all want to be the model child. We all want our parents to be proud. But the fact still remains — the children of today have grown up in a more sophisticated, more adult world.

The teens of today find themselves facing mature situations before their time. These situations are all around them, and it is something they have to learn. It is necessary for survival.

But abortion is also necessary for survival — not just for underaged women — but for sick, battered, and POOR women.

Smeal said, "This is not a fight worth fighting until personalized in your heart."

Maybe the men in this world cannot personalize it. But they better learn — and learn fast. The women of this nation have worked too long and too hard to allow the old men of the State House determine what is right for the women of future generations.

HOW DARE THEY EVEN TRY?

Smeal brought up a point, "God forbid we look at the boys."

Yes. God forbid. Should a man be allowed to sleep with a woman, yet get off when she says those magic words? I think NOT.

Women are not suckers. They are not stupid. So why do conservative senators such as a revered Mr. (for want of a better word) Helms, allow the passage of a bill to restrict poor and minority women from having subsidized abortions?

MAYBE, because they wouldn't vote for him if he spit-shined their shoes for a year. Maybe because he doesn't care for anything but the perfect family. Maybe he has never made mistakes.

Helms, and other conservatives, who overturn Roe v. Wade in their dreams, are making a mistake. A BIG mistake.

Maybe they'll someday have a personal tragedy like Bill Bell. Maybe then they'll listen to women like Ellie Smeal.

But, for some chauvanistic idea, I doubt it.

'Duffey, show some leadership'

One of the best parts of an education from UMass-Amherst comes to students indirectly. It's a lesson on human frailty — part psychology, part politics and a lot of economics.

More than at any private college in this state, students here today are better prepared for the "adult world."

Why? Because we have witnessed how a community such as ours responds to crisis.

This may be the first time that some of us have felt the impact of politics on our private lives.

Today's lesson has been induced by the recent budget cuts; it is that people panic when they run out of money.

A good example of this is the leader of the University community, President-Chancellor Duffey who, in his efforts to alert the "adult world" about the imminent tuition hikes, has gone too far and added an element of chaos to the crisis.

The Chancellor has said that he might raise tuition according to the level of the student's family income. For students who pay their own way and face more expensive bills, the Chancellor suggests this: "Young people should go to court to make a claim on their parents."

Two things, Chancellor: If I could afford a lawyer, I could afford to pay extra tuition. Maybe I could use Legal Services, but I understand that their funding is on the chopping block, too.

Please don't make empty, shot-in-the-dark suggestions on how we can stay in school under Duffey's New Deal.

This type of leadership is comparable to the crying driver of a broken down bus: It only makes everybody tense.

Two more things for the adult world: Parents, legislators, generous grandparents, our school wants to sue you for more money. But it's not money for students. It's for the school.

If you don't like the sound of this, then write a letter to the Board of Regents, which so far has only received four letters from parents complaining about costs (See Campus Chronicle, Oct. 12).

Also, I'll be home for Thanksgiving, so have the checkbook ready. If not, then I'll see you in court. I'm coming home an educated man.

The Minuteman Challenge

I am so very pleased to announce that the latest issue of the Minuteman appeared all over campus last week. I always like a good laugh.

I never take anything in the Minuteman seriously, but in that particular issue the section that interested me most was the "Parody" page. At the top of the page was something they dubbed the "Res. Ed. Challenge." If you answer yes to the 10 easy questions in this quiz, you have what it takes to be a Resident Assistant.

Michael Ditson

The questions in their quiz range from whether you are a Communist or a homosexual to whether you have an unpronouncable last name. Although I believe there is nothing wrong with any of those things, when I considered the tone in which it was presented, I was offended.

But, alas, don't worry everyone! It is all just a parody, right? Well, in the spirit of satire I have my own little quiz. Are you thinking of becoming a writer for the Minuteman? If you think you have what it takes, step right up, my redneck friend, and take the Minuteman Challenge.

1. Does everyone on your floor hate you?
2. Are you now or have you ever been a member of the Nazi party? (If not, any White supremacist organization will do.)
3. Do you automatically, without thinking, disagree with the opinion of everyone on issues that the majority of people feel are for the common good, for example things like Earth Day?
4. Are you jealous because the editors of the Dartmouth Review were on 20/20 and you weren't, even though you're just as bad?
5. Is your life so worthless and dull that you have to send "jeers" to anyone you don't agree with?
6. Do you read the Collegian religiously every day, even though you'll tell anyone who'll listen that it is a bunch of biased garbage?
7. Do you have a major inferiority complex?
8. Are your heroes boneheads like Jesse Helms, David Duke or possibly even Thurston P. Howell III?
9. Do you wear your ties everywhere (in class, in the shower, while making love, etc.)?
10. Are you just a plain old tight-ass?

If you answered "yes" to the majority of these questions, you would make a fine addition to the editorial board of the Minuteman.

If you did not answer "yes" to any of these questions, congratulations, because it means that you more than likely have a life of your own.

Michael Ditson is a UMass student

Chancellor is wrong about finances

This is an open letter to President-Chancellor Duffey:

After seeing your presentation to faculty and staff on Oct. 16, and after reading certain articles in the Collegian last week, I cannot help but ask the following question: Just where do you think you are?

In an attempt to assist students in dealing with continuing fee and tuition increases, you suggested last week that we pressure our parents to pay more of our expenses. You even went so far as to say that if it took legal action, then we should sue our parents. (This is an interesting proposal considering the current status of Legal Services)

Most students missed the real gem on Monday, though. Again, you stated your belief that parents should pay more, even if that means that "they give up the BMW or a winter vacation." (No I'm not making this up. He said it; I've got proof.)

Now tell me, President-Chancellor Duffey, if, as you stated in that same talk on Monday, many UMass students are the first in their families to attend college, how many BMW owners never went past high school?

How many parents are paying all they can, considering that they are suffering through the same miserable economy as this University?

Did you know that the "non-traditional student" is now the rule in the U.S., and not the exception? For many students, more money from parents is simply not an option.

I am one of those students. Your promise of increased financial aid for people like me might as well be printed on Confederate Bonds, considering that there is not enough aid now. I made $8,000 in 1989, and my unmet need and personal contribution was determined to be almost $4,000. That does not leave a whole lot left to buy food, books, clothes or pay mid-year fee increases. I was lucky that I received a generous private scholarship through the HRTA department.

Most people I know were not so lucky. They will be easy to recognize, Chancellor. They're the ones who won't be back this spring.

Stop looking for scapegoats, Chancellor. This is not the parents' fault. It is the fault of years of waste and mismanagement at every level, from the Feds to Boston to Whitmore. Listen to the faculty who suggested the furloughs be "dramatized." Perhaps the candidates for election in November will listen to them.

Tribe warms up blood, breaks alternative mold

By RUSSELL RYAN
Collegian Correspondent

O-Positive and Tribe
Bluewall
Saturday, Oct. 20

Having grown up in this area, I've been to see quite a few local "alternative" bands. I had several misgivings about O-Positive and Tribe, but these misgivings were dispelled.

Tribe opened up for O-Positive and were a good warm-up band. They played well, although it could have been tighter. Lead singer Janet LaValley had a husky Chrissy Hynde-type voice that came off well. The keyboardist and guitars complemented the vocals with several great electrostatic solos.

Tribe seemed like they were floundering for a style. Trying to blend the haunting sound of Throwing Muses into a more traditional rock band is an excellent concept, but it needs more work.

While each member of the band played well, there was a lack of coordination to them. The guitar distortion had a tendency to drown out the keyboards, and many of the songs seemed to cut off in the middle. The whole set had an unclear, fuzzy feel to it.

All in all, Tribe is a good band, but they needed to hone down their techniques, use more gusto and get a better idea of their style.

O-Positive gave a much tighter and cleaner performance. They were a refreshing change from the generic R.E.M. rip-off bands that so many of us have had to suffer through.

The slapping bass and unusual array of instruments gave the band a diverse sound. The trumpet, accordion and sax soloss were excellent additions to the traditional "alternative" sound.

O-Positive managed to blend these instruments into their style of music without making it sound contrived or tacked on as some sort of sideshow. They are obviously talented composers and musicians. There was a need for more lead guitar and the bass did get heavy at times, but the band showed a measure of talent and confidence that is missing in many bands today.

On stage, O-Positive had the feeling of coordination that Tribe lacks. The bandmembers worked together to create a strong, confident atmosphere that carried them through the show unmarred.

O-Positive got the crowd involved in the music, whereas Tribe seemed more introverted and crowd-shy.

All of these elements combined to make O-Positive a worthwhile show. Their talent, teamwork, attitude and unusual assortment of instruments make for an awesome evening. A much-needed change from the usual Saturday night beerfests and a good excuse to miss Twin Peaks.

Jeptha's Sky: Into the mind of a musician

By TONY WESTCOTT
Collegian Correspondent

Not a band or group as it might seem, Jeptha's Sky is really a state of mind the artist responsible for this album finds himself in when performing his songs. UMass student Andrew Epstein recorded the album entirely by himself (down to the gorgeously laid back trumpet solo in the title track), and his album speaks beautifully of just what is going on in his mind.

Epstein defines the theme of No Hay Salvavidas in the two most accessible tunes, "The Between Song" and the title track. Both are up tempo and boast infectious melodies, but more importantly, clarify what Jeptha's Sky is all about.

Translated from Spanish, "No Hay Salvavidas" is a warning found on signs meaning "No Lifeguard on Duty." Epstein uses this sign to describe how certain people would ignore or fear this sign, and how he would react to it himself. Throughout the album, he battles with the extremes of conservatism and liberalism and, refusing to fully commit to either side, he has become a social outcast. He does jump in the water, regardless of the sign, but he does so carefully, so as not to wade in too deep or "swallow too much water."

Unfortunately, although he sees his hapless hedonist hero, "Irving" meet an untimely death, he also feels the pressure from his elders in "It's Over," to behave as nothing less than a moral law-abiding citizen.

RECORD REVIEW

But neither is he a true outlaw as the western-flavored statement-of-purpose song, "Steamer" shows. This track deftly displays how he turns out to be more of an inept adolescent than a virile daredevil.

Still, society fails to recognize his independence. In "The Between Song," he is branded as something as worthless as "shooting point blank with blanks," because he refuses to conform to either side.

In "Silly Boy," his romantic endeavors fail and in "It's Over," he feels his entire character threatened, yet he triumphs by never giving up his identity – something that is very hard to do in adolescence. Fortunately, he does find a temporary resolve and happy ending of sorts in the peaceful lullaby that closes the album.

All the while, the dreary chord changes and R.E.M.-esque melodies enhance Epstein's experiences in a rich, passionate manner. At times, the guitar onslaught becomes tedious, but only Epstein's overbearing anthem, "Hippies and Yuppies" detracts form the inherent theme; he works much better in the first person, at least on this album. And while his vocals are plaintive but ragged in places, his guitar interplay is never less than interesting. Epstein undoubtedly has a talent for the singer-songwriter style he uses, and pulls it off in an honest, soulful way.

However, for those of you who do not have an affinity for the music of Lou Reed, Neil Young or UMass' Ari Vais (never a bad comparison) or don't care for records buried in guitars, Jeptha's Sky will not convert you. But if you're looking for a slightly depressing autumnal soundtrack from one of the latest breed of singer/songwriters, No Hay Salvavidas is a very satisfying record.

Prize-winning poet takes listeners on a tour of his soul

By ALEX DERING
Collegian Correspondent

Charles Simic, recipient of the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for poetry, read some of his work to a group of about 200 persons Thursday night in Herter Hall.

The hour-long reading was a brief trip through a warehouse of angst, with Simic serving as tour guide. His slight Slavic accent and schoolteacher image – he wore black pants, a dark blue shirt and wire-rimmed glasses – only heightened the surrealistic quality of the poems.

The first poem he read was entitled "The Infinite."

"On a long shot, I went searching for your, Miranda, downtown, when the offices empty at five. . ."

He followed with poems that offered other statements of loss and isolation. Among the more memorable phrases were such statements as:

"Purse snatchers, keep away from poor old women. They yell the loudest."

"I believe in the soul. So far, it hasn't made much difference."

"I was stolen by the gypsies. My parents stole me right back."

It is this sense of ironic humor, this ability to paint an image and then throw something completely unexpected at the reader, coupled with Simic's unique talent to look at an everyday object and turn it into something slightly sinister, that make him one of America's most refreshing poets. To Simic, it isn't a tube of red lipstick, it's a severed thumb.

"I like to show readers that the most familiar things that surround them are unintelligible," explained Simic in a letter to a friend. "[There are] two ways of creating: to uncover what is already there, or to make something entirely new. My problem is I believe in both."

REVIEW

He expanded on this thought after the poetry reading.

"I try to examine the human condition and find something unusual about it," Simic said. "For instance, people who aren't religious but are superstitious. I try to take that and go with it."

This examination of the dichotomy in the human condition can be seen in "December," from his book Unending Blues.

Simic, 52, who came to this country from Yugoslavia in 1949, was the recipient of a MacArthur Fellowship from 1984-1989. He has written over 15 books of poetry and prose and has received awards from the National Endowment for the Arts and the Guggenheim Foundation.

He has translated the work of Ivan Lalic, Vasko Popa and Tomas Salamun and has had his work published in a dozen different languages worldwide. His books include Return to a Place Lit by a Glass of Milk and The World Doesn't End, for which he won the Pulitzer.

The different groups and ideas represented by the 11 speakers at the rally reflected this theme of a multi-purpose fight.

Tito Mesa, of the Central American Solidarity Association, compared the U.S. presence in Saudi Arabia to its presence in El Salvador, apartheid in South Africa, and Israeli presence in occupied territory in Palestine.

"Why are troops in Nicaragua? The purpose is to defeat the revolution in El Salvador. The [El Salvadorian] government is one more puppet in U.S. imperialism," he said. "The struggle in Nicaraguan, South African, and Palestinian people will not be crushed. Long live the struggle of oppressed peoples of the world."

Political satirist Barry Crimmins called Kuwait a "family-owned oil company with a flag." He added, "Making women fight Saudi Arabia is like making Blacks fight for South Africa."

David Stitt, of the AIDS activist group Act-Up, said, "I'm no fan of Hussein, but I'm angry that he gave Bush another excuse to ignore AIDS." He referred to Bush's recent proposal to cut more than half of the funds provided for AIDS research by the Ryan White bill. White, 11, last spring died of AIDS.

Bienvenida Reyes, of the All People's Congress of Rhode Island, said, "The U.S. wants a war in a place called the Middle East, and to kill people called Arabs. Are [Arabs] the oil sheiks that the media tell us? No.

"Millions of [Arab] people die each year from poverty. Like the people of El Salvador and South Africa, the Arab people are controlled by imperialism. We must defend the right of Arab governments to say 'no' to imperialism and control the oil in their own ground."

Vietnam War veteran Nancy Clark said, "It is wrong to have another generation of people who will suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder and birth defects. I don't want to have to come back when I'm 75 and in my wheelchair and living on welfare, and protest yet another outragious act by the U.S. government."

Rev. Graylan Ellis-Hagler, of the Church of the United Community, questioned Bush's statement the U.S. is in Saudi Arabia to protest Hussein's "naked aggression."

"U.S. invading Panama was cold aggression? U.S. invading Grenada was aggression with a tuxedo on? Wasn't the killing of women and priests in Panama naked aggression, or was that aggression all dressed up and ready to go to the party of suppression?"

Following the rally, protestors marched around the commons, past the Statehouse, then along Winter Street through Downtown Crossing. They held signs which read, "Blood is More Precious Than Oil," and "How Many Deaths to the Gallon?" and chanted, "Hell no, we won't go, we won't fight for Texaco," and "200,000 troops, out of the Middle East."

While many bystanders smiled in support, one observer said, "These are all wannabees. They want to be the 60s."

ARIES (March 21-April 19) Know who your true friends are. This is not a good time to lend or borrow money. Call on your intellectual powers to support you during periods of stress. Review your insurance coverage.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Be alert to signs that there is stormy weather ahead. Health and employment matters bear close watching. A telephone call or letter from home boosts your spirits. Share your hopes.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Avoid taking unnecessary risks today. Stick to the tried and true. Too much criticism could endanger an alliance. Double-check hotel arrangements if traveling for business today.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) A great day to seek personal services. Improve your appearance in every possible way. Dive into a work project and you will make a big splash. A new investment strategy has real merit.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Donating your time and money to a worthy cause will make you feel great. Take personal charge of a complicated financial or employment matter. Routine tasks will be a breeze.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) The tides are shifting. Concentrate on projects already under way. Follow your heart where romance is concerned. Treat the object of your affection to a night on the town.

LIBRA (Sept. 2-Oct. 22) Examine a business proposition very carefully. Guard against making hasty investments this afternoon. Charity begins at home. Avoid scattering your forces. Direct your energies to well-defined targets.

SCORPIO (Oct. 22-Dec. 21) It is great comfort to have money salted away for a rainy day. Be sure your insurance coverage is adequate. Romance will be high on your list of activities tonight.

first possession, then shut down quarterback Bill Vergantino and the complex Wing-T attack for the rest of the day. UMass sacked Vergantino eight times for 65 yards, led by tackle Rich Kane (fours sacks, 31 yards) and outside linebacker Mario Perry (two sacks, 19 yards).

Any thoughts of a Delaware comeback were crushed by a ferocious pass rush that sacked Vergantino five times in the late third and early fourth quarter, and pressured him into misfiring on several passes late in the game.

Delaware netted just 11 yards rushing (minus-35 in the second half) and 135 yards total offense all day.

The UMass offense, meanwhile, built a 10-3 lead in the first half on a 1-yard plunge by fullback David Mitchell and a 32-yard field goal by Marco Gabrielli.

Junior split end Lamar Newsome kept the touchdown drive alive in a third-and-seven on the Delaware 34 yard line, hauling in a short pass from Wilkos and breaking a shoestring tackle by Warren McIntyre to get the first down.

Freshman Eric Thimas returned a punt 61 yards for a touchdown late in the third quarter to give UMass its final 17-3 result.

Thimas had lost his starting job returning punts after fumbling several earlier this season, but was called upon Saturday because Don Caperotti was out with a sprained ankle. Thimas made a clean catch and scooted through an enormous hole toward the left sideline, then shook punter Gene Vadas on the 10 yard line en route to the end zone.

"I pride myself in not letting the kicker tackle me," Thimas said.

Sophomore Tom Fasano and strong-armed junior Paul Tornatore teamed to replace Wilkos in the fourth quarter, and struggled to move the UMass offense. UMass cashed in just two first downs after Wilkos' exit.

Fasano took the majority of snaps and gained 59 yards on six rushes; Tornatore entered in obvious passing situations.

Game Notes: A parent's day crowd of 22,184 showed up under clear 65-degree skies . . . Thimas said of his troubles fielding kicks, "I knew in my head it was just me dropping the ball, and you can't be back there if you can't catch." . . . Vergantino, last year's Yankee Conference and ECAC Rookie-of-the-Year, entered the game with 12 interceptions . . . The UMass Marching Band was in top form, prepped for Sunday's appearance at halftime of the Giants-Cardinals game at the Meadowlands in New Jersey . . . A rabbit scampered across the UMass end zone toward a row of hedges in the first quarter, with the Delaware Fightin' Blue Hen in hot pursuit .

■ Wilkos injury

UMass linebacker Mario Perry said he was inspired to play harder when he heard Delaware fans taunting and heckling Wilkos as he lay on the field. Wilkos did receive an ovation from the entire Delaware team, gathered on the field, as he left the stadium.

"The best quarterback in the league went down and people were pointing fingers," Perry said. "Gary is a great friend of the whole team . . . and I was angry."

"You're always going to get a certain few boneheads around. There were a lot of them sitting behind our bench," Reid said in reference to the heckling Delaware fans. "There's always going to be a few jerks. But from my standpoint, the Delaware players showed the utmost respect for Gary's injury."

UMass quarterback Gary Wilkos is currently outfitted with a halo brace and is in stable condition after a routine hit during the third quarter of Saturday's game against Delaware.

Football throttles Blue Hens, 17-3

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

NEWARK, Del. — The 1990 University of Massachusetts football team has accomplished something no UMass squad has ever done.

It beat Delaware.

UMass moved into first place in the Yankee Conference (5-0) and snapped an 0-14 streak against the Fightin' Blue Hens (3-2) that dated bc.ck to 1958 with a 17-3 win Saturday in Newark.

On an emotional afternoon that saw quarterback Gary Wilkos lost for the season with a neck injury, the Minutemen ended all talk of a Delaware jinx with an outstanding defensive effort.

The Minutemen counted the final seconds of the game off the clock, then mobbed each other on the 35 yard line in a wild celebration. Coach Jim Reid raced across the field and kissed Delaware coach Tubby Raymond before heading to the locker room amid a crush of high fives and jubilant players.

"0 and 14, now I don't have to answer that anymore," Reid said.

Said senior tackle Al Pogarian, "This win puts us in the history books."

Wilkos suffered a fractured vertebra at the base of his neck in the third quarter, and lay on the field surrounded by trainers for a terrifying half hour before an ambulance arrived to take him to a nearby hospital.

Wilkos was conscious throughout and had full use of his arms and legs; he gripped hands with several teammates and implored others to "look at me" before being driven off the field.

Wilkos will remain at the Christiana Medical Center in Stanton, Del. for the week and will not play again this season (see related story, this page).

Wilkos injured, out for season

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts quarterback Gary Wilkos is in stable condition at Christiana Medical Center in Stanton, Del. after suffering a fractured first vertebra (at the base of his neck) during Saturday's game at Delaware.

Wilkos has full use of his arms and legs, and shows no signs of neurological damage, according to a nurse that is attending him at Christiana.

The injury is similar to the one suffered by Ohio State basketball star Jay Burson in 1988. Burson fractured his third vertebra, wore a halo brace for 12 weeks, and returned to play professional basketball.

Wilkos, nicknamed "Gumby" by teammates for his flexibility and ability to recover from injuries, has also been outfitted with a halo brace and will not play again this season.

Wilkos has previously recovered from back, wrist, rib and shoulder injuries.

Injured near the 30 yard line at the the end of an eight-yard run, Wilkos was conscious and had use of his arms and legs at all times. Before leaving Delaware Stadium by ambulance, he squeezed the hands of several players, and asked his uncle, Rev. Philip Franceschini, to pray that he not be responsible for a loss of momentum in the game (UMass led 10-7), according to coach Jim Reid.

"He wanted to remove his helmet and they wouldn't let him," Reid said. "I think if he'd had his druthers he would have gone ahead and got up . . . he perked up. I brought his mother [onto the field] and he chewed my ass out for that.

"I knew then he was going to be OK," Reid said.

Fans, players and media, however, were unable to judge the severity of Wilkos' injury and waited 36 agonizing minutes for an ambulance to arrive as he lay surrounded by trainers.

Two ambulances were on duty at the stadium but both were off on other emergencies and couldn't be called back at the moment Wilkos was injured, according to a technician with the University of Delaware Emergency Medical Team.

A third ambulance was dispatched, but originally went to the wrong location on campus.

"In my opinion, Gary would not want to make a big deal out of this and take anything away from a great football game," Reid said.

Several UMass players and Reid said that the hit causing Wilkos' injury was routine and not unnecessarily violent. On the play, safety Jay Mirabella wrapped up Wilkos from behind, leaving him slightly upright to absorb a head-on blow from a second Delaware player.

"It was absolutely a clean hit," Reid said. Added UMass cornerback Vaughn Williams, "That's just part of the game, unfortunately."

UConn turns Reds blue, 2-0

Clear, cool Connecticut skies turned the Reds the blues when the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team lost to the UConn Huskies in a 2-0 decision yesterday.

The Reds held the Huskies (whose colors are blue and white) scoreless for the first 15 minutes of the game. Sophomore Barbara Chura connected with freshman Karen Ferguson in the UMass box, where Ferguson beat keeper Skye Eddy to hit the lower right corner of the net from 15 yards out. The score remained in UConn's favor 1-0 to the half.

Six minutes into the second half, a corner kick set up a scramble in the UMass box where Ferguson netted the ball in the upper right corner.

The scoring ended with UConn ahead 2-0.

UMass took 10 shots on goal, as UConn took seven. The Reds had seven corner kicks, compared to the Huskies' three. The game was equally aggressive as UMass was called on 18 fouls, whereas UConn had 21. UMass sophomore Holly Helmuth was issued a yellow card in the first half. Goalkeeper Eddy finished the game with one save, as UConn's junior Wendy Logan had four saves.

This is the Reds' first loss since Dartmouth (1-0) on Oct. 4. The ISAA poll will be tallied after this weekend's activity to determine where UMass (8-5-2) stands nationally. They were No. 10 last week, and first in New England.

Field hockey rams URI, 2-1

Saturday afternoon in Kingston, RI, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team defeated the Rams of URI 2-1.

Mara Frattasio scored the game winning goal. The victory extends the team's win streak to five games.

When the rankings come out Tuesday, the Minutewomen who went 3-0 last week will likely move up, and can do no worse than hold eighth.

Last week the Minutewomen defeated No. 16 Springfield College as well as Dartmouth. With their win over URI, UMass now has a record of 12-4.

The significance of the win at Rhode Island is that the Minutewomen stand a chance of entering the A-10 Tournament (Nov. 3) as the number one seed. UMass finishes the A-10 regular season with a 4-1 mark, their only loss against Temple (3-2).

UMass has three games left until the A-10 Tourney. Wednesday, No. 13 Boston University comes to Totman. On Saturday UMass is at Connecticut, and Sunday, the Minutewomen play their final home game of the year against Maine.

Volleyball drops two more

Team (3-19) loses 3-0 to both GWU, GMU

By LIOR BEN-AHARON
Collegian Correspondent

It has been a tough season for University of Massachusetts volleyball and it wasn't going to get any easier over the weekend.

On Friday the Minutewomen (3-17) headed to Washington, D.C., to face the Colonials of George Washington University (10-11).

The Colonial's record entering the match was a bit misleading because, after a slow start, they had won eight of their last nine matches.

The streak became nine-of-ten Friday night after GWU handily beat UMass in three games by the scores of 1-15, 8-15 and 8-15.

"They're really good," coach Carol Ford said of the Colonials.

From Washington, the Minutewomen (3-18) headed to Fairfax, Va., for a Saturday afternoon meeting with George Mason University (6-8).

After the rough loss to GW, Ford said her team had a "heart-to-heart talk" and went to George Mason "to beat them."

Despite displaying a higher level of intensity than the previous night, UMass was overpowered by George Mason's strong blocking corps and lost all three games (6-15, 2-15 and 7-15).

"We just couldn't put the ball away," said Ford.

The Minutewomen (3-19) not only lost the match, but also lost setter Angie Paolucci to a sprained wrist in the third game.

The injury was just another chapter in Paolucci's (and the team's) hard luck season. She missed much of the early part of the season due to a virus, missed the GW match because of the flu, and now has a sprained wrist.

It is unknown how long Paolucci will be out, but Ford did mention the sprain was serious.

In Paolucci's absence, Cathy Smith filled in the setter's position, as she has done throughout the season, and 'did a good job," said Ford.

Along with Smith, Ford pointed out the good play of sophomore middle-blocker Sharon Panoff, who is "back to her usual level of play again."

According to Ford, the volleyball team will concentrate more on offense this week in practice. While the serving and passing games have improved the team is still having problems finishing off the plays.

"We just want ot keep moving ahead," said Ford of her team.

The Minutewomen will host Boston College at 7 p.m. tomorrow in Totman Gym.

Five College consortium addresses CLT

• Five College presidents denounce Question 3

• Duffey addresses budget-related concerns

By CHRIS MUTHER
Collegian Staff

Presidents of four area private colleges and the provost of the University of Massachusetts denounced yesterday the consequences of Question 3, marking the first time the Five College consortium have taken a unified, public stand on a ballot question.

Mary Maples Dunn, president of Smith College, said at a press conference yesterday that the Citizens for Limited Taxation ballot question is not the solution to the state's current fiscal difficulties.

"People are looking for simple solutions to a difficult problem, and this isn't the solution," she said

Dunn said the CLT petition builds on several American traits: a distrust of government, looking for an "easy way out," reaction to believed scandal in government and an aversion to paying taxes.

She said Proposition 2 1/2, which passed in 1980, lead to a state redistribution of funds to help communities restricted from raising property taxes, but said this is not the case with Question 3.

"It disturbs me, there is no place for public good with CLT. Concern for the public good seems to be completely lacking," she said.

University Provost O'Brien stressed that UMass has already seen substantial cuts in the past two years, and if question 3 passes the impact will be "simply enormous."

"It wouldn't be a question of being second best, it would become a question of being 50th best, because we would be the worst in the nation," he said.

O'Brien said that although the University has been able to stay competitive through the recent cuts, that would change if the CLT petition passes.

He added Massachusetts needs to avoid a "bumper sticker" approach to politics. "The solution to these problems can't be summed up in a few words, we need to set priorities as a state," he said.

Peter Pouncy, president of Amherst College, said Question 3 will place Massachusetts in an economic dark age.

"This is more than a case of shooting ourselves in the foot. . . Question 3 will wreck things in this state," he said.

Pouncy said colleges and universities are bringing younger people into the state, and those people start companies and make jobs for the state. He said if CLT passes, this process will dramatically slow down.

"The quality of life in the state will be dented," he said.

Pouncy stressed that if CLT passes, not only will public institutions be affected, but private schools will also be affected.

"We give a number of state funded scholarships to students, which would be eliminated if CLT passes," he said.

Gregory Prince, president of Hampshire college, said only about 3 percent of his school's budget would be affected if the CLT petition passes, but the cuts would have far reaching affects on higher education.

"Higher education is too important to be left to private schools — we need the element of competition that exists between public and private universities," Prince said.

Describing the event as a "town meeting for parents," President-Chancellor Duffey addressed several budget-related concerns last night in Framingham in an attempt to increase communication between the University and the parents of students.

During the two-hour meeting Duffey told the group of 250 parents details of a three-part plan for dealing with the latest $10.6 million cut from the University's budget.

"Reluctantly, we must raise student fees again in the second semester," he said.

Duffey said fees could be increased by as much as $400 per student next semester, but that his administration may be able to compensate for that increase by reducing other mandatory student fees.

The second part of Duffey's plan would consist of trimming an additional $2 million from various University services, such as counseling and health services. Duffey described these cuts as necessary.

"We are struggling to hold onto some quality in the face of budget cuts," Duffey said, adding that he did not feel the quality of education at the University had been undermined significantly to date.

Duffey also brought up the spectre of further layoffs, and suggested that the University may have to go forward with a plan to furlough all University employees for up to five days.

"It's a great deal to ask of our employees," he said. "They haven't seen a cost of living increase in over two years."

Duffey announced that he would propose a new scholarship plan to deal with the fallout of higher student fees, saying $600,000 has already has already been tentatively approved by the University for such a purpose. He said the scholarships would be given out on a basis of need.

One father of asked the chancellor why he did not seem angry at the present situation.

"I try not to be consumed by anger, but rather try to understand the situation. My voice may be low, but I am still just as angry," he said.

Another parent wondered why a coordinating group had not been formed to address these concerns, and accused Duffey of not communicating enough with parents. Duffey replied that he has participated in a three-and-half hour meeting with students last Wednesday, and that the Framingham meeting with parents was unique among public colleges.

President-Chancellor Duffey

Duffey, who has been active in the opposition to the tax-cutting initiative sponsored by Citizens for Limited Taxation, said he thought the petition would be an "absolute disaster for the state."

Duffey said he is focusing on stabilizing the present situation and that he would "deal with it when it happens."

Israeli police set up blockades to bar visitors

JERUSALEM (AP) — A Palestinian youth stabbed an Israeli delivery man in Jerusalem yesterday as police sent 2,000 reinforcements into the city and set up roadblocks to keep Arab visitors out.

Police said the travel ban was intended to prevent assaults on Jews. They said they also feared Jews might attack Palestinians to avenge the killings Sunday of three Jews by an Arab assailant.

Scattered clashes were reported yesterday between stone-throwing Palestinians and Israeli troops in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip. At least 18 Palestinians were shot and wounded by troops, Arab reports said.

An Arab youth attacked a solider with an ax yesterday in a military government building in the Gaza town of Rafah, Arab and Israeli reports said. On Sunday night, a solider was assaulted by an attacker armed with a knife in the Gaza town of Khan Yunis. Both soldiers were slightly wounded, radio reports said.

Police said a 46-year-old Israeli, Moshe Koren, was slightly wounded in the back when he was attacked by a Palestinian yesterday as he unloaded his meat truck outside a supermarket. The Palestinian was a delivery boy at the market.

'Books Not Bombs' packs SU steps

Over 200 gather to protest U.S. intervention in Middle East

By JEREMY LEVINSON
Collegian Staff

More than 200 students, staff and faculty packed the Student Union steps yesterday as speakers warned of the dangers of a United States-provoked war in the Middle East.

The Ad-Hoc Coalition Against a War in the Middle East, a University of Massachusetts-based organization, organized the "Books Not Bombs" rally to launch their campaign against what some see as an imminent war.

Speakers emphasized the urgency of organizing against U.S. intervention. Michael Holroyd, of the American Friends Service Committee, told the crowd "students have lead the struggle for social change," because it is their lives on the line.

Speakers demanded that the United States government seek permanent solutions to the problem of oil dependency, and work toward global security rather than in the interests of United States oil companies.

"The U.S., with 5 percent of the world's population, uses one-quarter of all the energy in the world," Economics Professor Sam Bowles said. Rather than "thinking we can run the world," he said, the U.S. needs to find creative ways to reduce our dependency on oil.

"We have to deal with an environmental crises at home. Support U.S. armed forces by asking them to come home," he said.

Philosophy Professor Ann Ferguson listed the Bush Administration's "feeble" pro-intervention arguments, and said the consequences of militarism have already come home, referring to the "peace dividend."

Coalition organizers said the rally's success was a sign that students are coming together to oppose government militarism. They urged all concerned community members to attend their Monday meetings at 7 p.m. in the Commuter Lounge of the Student Union.

UM student trustee debates CLT chairperson

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

In a confrontational debate at Westfield State College last night, a University of Massachusetts student and the chairperson of Citizens for Limited Taxation disputed over the possible impact that the tax rollback question could have on the future of the state economy and public higher education.

Ballot question number three is a referendum petition written by CLT which, if passed by voters on Nov. 6, would roll back state and fee increases to 1988 levels, mandating a state revenue loss of approximately $1.4 billion.

Angus McQuilken, student trustee for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, opened the debate by arguing that ballot question three would virtually eliminate state funding in the middle of this fiscal year for human services, public higher education and roads and bridges.

Student Trustee Angus McQuilken

"CLT claims that this cut will only be 8 percent out of a $13.4 billion budget, but when you disregard the non-discretionary part of the budget, you are taking $1.4 billion out of $4 billion," McQuilken said.

Non-discretionary monies fund Medicaid, debt service, pensions, the MBTA and local aid. McQuilken said that the referendum would go into effect on Dec. 6 when half of the budget has already been spent, doubling the impact of the $1.2 cut.

Paul Nicolai, the chair of the CLT board, countered that question three would save the state economy from "a blueprint of disaster" created by legislative spending which has significantly passed growth revenues. CLT is the only way to stop the burden of mismanaged state finances from falling on the shoulders of the taxpayers, he said.

He said the legislature will solely determine how the cuts will be implemented if CLT passes and that critics of the question are trying to overestimate the impact to project a state future of "death, disaster and devastation."

"There are no specific cuts written into the petition because that would be unconstitutional," Nicolai said. "There is only one crisis in Massachusetts politics which is a crisis of common sense that tells you can't have state spending growing at nearly four times the rate of inflation."

The petition specifically exempts public higher education tuition and fee increases from being rolled back. McQuilken said public higher education will lose an estimated $126 million if CLT passes, which would follow $169 million in state cuts in the last three years.

In 1987, Massachusetts subsidized spending on public higher education was second in the country, but now ranks 41st after state cuts McQuilken said. Massachusetts is the only state to have decreased higher education spending in the country over the last three years.

CLT Board Chairperson Paul Nicolai

"If CLT passes and $126 billion is cut, we'll be ranked 49th," he said. "Is that something that Massachusetts can be proud of?"

Nicolai countered that higher education is still running at top capacity when the number of in-state high school students has continually decreased from a peak in the mid-1970s. He added that Massachusetts has the lowest national birth rate.

He criticized Timm Rhinehart, the director of admissions at UMass-Amherst for spending "millions of dollars on marketing and selling to out-of-state students."

"The issue is increasing taxes on people by subsidizing out-of-state students whether they can pay or not," he said.

M.Y. Place offers clients haircuts with a smile

By ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

If you're looking for a hometown haircut, then M.Y. Place is your place. For six years, Michael Wilkins has been cutting hair at the University of Massachusetts Barber Shop.

During that period Wilkins has established a reputation as someone who cares about, and spends time with, each customer. As a result, Wilkins has built a large clientele of happy and loyal students and community members.

After much encouragement from his clients, friends and family, Wilkins opened his own shop on Pray street in Amherst, named M.Y. Place, over the summer. The Y in M.Y. Place stands for Ynez Wilkins, his partner and wife who runs most of the business aspects of the shop.

"The barber shop was a relaxing place when I grew up. I enjoyed it and I want to provide that same service," said Wilkins. "People need a chance to be pampered."

Unlike the traditional barber shops, M.Y. Place doesn't carry newspapers. Wilkins said that he really wants people to relax, and "how can you relax while reading the newspaper?" Wilkins said.

At M.Y. Place Wilkins has a clean shop and an aquarium with tropical fish, which he says contributes to a tranquil setting. He plays jazz and fusion music, and displays local arts and crafts.

Wilkins said that although he wants to bring back the "barber shop" easiness of the old days, he is determined to dispel the myth that barber shops cater only to men.

So far he says there's been a fairly even amount of female customers, something which he is happy about because he enjoys working on all different hair styles

Wilkins' customers said his place is special and different because "there they spend more time with you." The other notable difference between M.Y. Place and it's bigger competitors is that Wilkins doesn't do any chemical processing and uses all natural hair care products. The shop also offers facials, manicures and peticures.

Reminiscent of small town businesses, Wilkins employs community youth to do shop assistant tasks. Wilkins said that this helps to keep them out of trouble, gives them something to be proud of and offers the opportunity for them to see how a business is run.

Wilkins said that he's happy with business thus far. He said he feels confident because he sees this as an art form more so than a job.

Speaker addresses future of malls and retail stores

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

Retailing will undergo radical changes in the next decade, according to an assistant financial editor and retailing specialist for the New York Times.

Isadore Barmash, addressing an audience of 80 people in the Campus Center last night, discussed the future of retail stores, strip centers and malls through the turn of the century.

"Stores must develop a clear focus which will attract customers," Barmash said, "and insure the merchandise is worth the money. 'In stock' should mean 'in stock.'"

Retail constitutes two-thirds of the gross national product, and employs over 2 million persons, said Barmash.

The retail market will be forced to make changes in company management due to a loss in their profit margin during 1984-1989. Profit margins fell from 2.5 to 1.6 percent in that time.

In that same time period, the debt-to-equity rate for many companies rose from 2.6 to 3.6 percent, because of the large loans these corporation made and are unable to pay off.

Barmash said he expects radical changes in the retail world by the year 2000. He said he expects to see department stores such as J.C. Penney and Sears break off into smaller specialty chains, while Wal-Mart is expected to be the biggest retailer in the history of the world, bringing in over an estimated $1 million in net profits in 1991.

Other stores, such as The Limited and The Gap, are considered to be growth markets, because they are smaller, speciality shops.

One problem with retail marketing, said Barmash, is the management. "Management gets so entrenched [in themselves] that they forget the basics," he said. There are no winners in retail "when the retailers decide they and only they know what the public wants," Barmash said.

Cows, country mice, Bambi and Western Mass.

Meredith O'Brien

It took me awhile to get to campus this morning. I don't know about all of you, but I had a helluva time avoiding those cows in the middle of the road. Oh, and those deer crossings, it took forever to cross that road. I missed the first 10 minutes of my 10:10 class just waiting there on Route 116 for Bambi to high-tail it out of there so I could get going.

I hear some of you scratching your heads. What, like you've never seen the cows and deer running rampant in Amherst and Hadley, all over Western Massachusetts?

Come on now, you should all realize that once you pass Worcester, the state becomes desolate cow land. For years I've explained to my friends from the suburban and bustling Eastern side of the state that we actually have big, green lawns and farms out here, right next to UMass.

Yes, I've told them, our local television newscasts do feature high school sporting events as the lead stories of the sports segment. Yes, the local newspapers are just that, local — filled with local events and concerns alongside statewide and some national and international Associated Press stories.

Yes, we call our subs grinders. (Although once besieged by Eastern Mass friends, we ruefully call them subs anyway.)

Yes, our idea of a traffic jam is about 20 or so cars waiting on a one-lane "highway" for the goats to get out of the road.

Yes, the biggest city in this area is Springfield. (While it may be difficult for most Eastern Massers to comprehend, for us Springfield is the epitome of citydom.)

. . .But what I think bothers those of us who came from and now reside in Western Mass most is the blatant superiority that the Eastern Mass residents tout with them everywhere they go.

Classic WesternMassism. You see it everyday.

Sometimes it gets a little bit tiresome for us civilized but simple folk to repeatedly explain to others that we actually are a part of the state, that the state line does not end at Worcester.

While we don't ask for very much, just good crop weather, happy animals, and careful drivers who can avoid hitting our cows, we don't much like to be forgotten by those political gurus up there on Beacon Hill.

Whenever problems and chaos hit the state, Eastern Mass is always the focal point. How does this affect the suburban areas, the cities (exempting Springfield from city status)? How many voters do we have to influence in Eastern Mass. to get this person elected, to get this referendum question passed?

It gets a bit disheartening when even our gubernatorial candidates, the Eastern Mass. dwellers William Weld and John Silber, take on this WesternMassist attitude and basically ignore this side of the state.

When inquiries about a possible trip out to UMass were posed recently to the gubernatorial campaign managers, the answer was a simple, "Well, maybe, we might do a one-day Western Mass tour." A one-day tour, for the entire Western part of the state.

Typical.

Western Mass is constantly being left out of important decisions. Our voters are dubbed insignificant "hicks" because of our small numbers and spacious cities and towns.

While we Western Massers have grown accustomed to this typical condescension from our Eastern Mass counterparts, we generally do not complain. We're the proverbial country mice while the rest of the state is filled with the city mice who are viewed as more important and more influential than us. That's just the way it is.

But I don't really mind our cows, though they do smell.

Errors detract from Pops review

As members of the ensembles who participated in the 16th annual Multiband Pops concert, we were thrilled to see an article concerning the event in the Oct. 15 edition of the Collegian, ("UMass talent bursts forth in Multiband Pops"), which was a favorable review of a performance that gave all who attended good reason to feel proud of the Department of Music and Dance as well as the University.

We all need reassurance in these financially troubled times, and it seems any positive news received about our University helps students to believe the future is worth the fight. However, we would like to point out there were several factual errors which detracted from the positive tone of the article.

- Several performing groups were omitted: Jazz Ensemble I, Symphony Band, the University Dancers and the Percussion Ensemble.

- Only two pieces of music were represented by name and/or composer, and most were simply called a "lively piece" or a "Russian piece." In the body of music review, it is customary to include titles, composers and specific facts about the music.

- The gospel tune "Save Me" was composed by UMass professor Jeff Holmes, an important fact which was overlooked.

- The article stated, "The event was rehearsed only one night as a complete production." In fact, a complete rehearsal never took place.

- The article stated, "All the groups had been at school a week before it started to prepare for their individual performances." Again, only the marching band arrived early to prepare for their first game, and the other groups had only a few weeks to prepare for Multibands.

The correspondent obviously enjoyed herself during the concert, and we appreciate the extensive coverage given to the events. Next time, however, we would hope the Collegian staff would strive for more accurate and complete coverage.

EWC cuts needed

The recent budget cuts at UMass have been felt everywhere on campus. Classes have been cut, Faculty and staff positions have been left vacant. Tuition has gone up. Fees have gone up. All indications suggest this will continue.

Amid all of the budgetary hoopla, the UMass administration has done its best to be fair in "trimming" the budget. For the most part, I find they have been fair. My appreciation and thanks go to those administrators who are doing their best in a bad situation.

There is one result of the budget cuts which I feel requires serious re-evaluation. No, I don't think the administrators made a mistake; I think that many students are making a mistake. I refer to the recent fuss over the decision to move two Everywoman's Center staff people to other jobs.

Everybody on this campus (and UMass-Boston, Worcester and every other state school) has suffered from the budget cuts. I can understand the feelings that the clients of the EWC feel, but I feel it is time they realize that things are tough. NOBODY is going to escape the financial ax, and to complain about losing two positions while the library is being gutted, important academic programs are being reduced or eliminated and teaching faculty let go, is ridiculous.

It is a shame that important programs like EWC need to be cut. Unfortunately, the key word is NEED. Many programs have been cut, and many more will be. I would suggest that people would consider what the support services will be like if the budget continues to collapse. As the budget gets tighter and tighter, small programs will be eliminated instead of being cut. Maybe instead of fighting for EWC, you should be fighting for UMass.

Even after all that doom and gloom...

Anna Regina Santiago

Depressing, isn't it? The job market in Massachusetts doesn't look too hot. The University is cutting all over the place, and there seems no end in sight. Duffey, armed with quick wit and sharp intelligence, has proposed that we take our own parents (those irresponsible rascals) to court should they have the audacity not to have enough money to pay for our education.

Forces numbering approximately 500,000 from about a dozen nations are now arrayed in and around Saudi Arabia to defend the latter against Iraq. I ask once again, "What for?"

On the UMass campus, rhetoric is being hurled back and forth (and back again) about the recent killings of Palestinians in Jerusalem, threatening to erupt into yet another source of violent conflict right here in the Happy Valley anyway.

As if having to go to war weren't bad enough, male soldiers now also have to worry about their wives, sisters or mothers being raped by demented jackasses who take the "yellow ribbon" (what was supposed to symbolize grief for the soldiers' absence and hopeful anticipation of their return) as an invitation to rape and attack those left behind.

The Politically Correct are still at it, and growing in alarming numbers. Their definition is still as vague as their intent. Whichever side you're on, the "other side" will always be racist, sexist or homophobic (or, sadly enough, all of the above). And no matter how much you try to stay out of it, you are already in it, simply by virtue of being alive and in college.

It seems that it is now the norm in Amherst to be angry about at least one thing. If you're not, some force will inevitably suck you into a conflict anyway.

Either way you lose because Amherst is not the best place to seethe, huff and puff about injustices. It has created an atmosphere of intelligent debate no doubt, but it's safely tucked away in the boondocks of Western Mass [See Meredith's column]. How far do you think any cerebral discussion will go? Not very far, I've noticed. Many people are still consciously resorting to the same irresponsible tactics that got the Middle East crisis started in the first place. Ever heard of learning a lesson from the past and present?

All that said and done, one question keeps popping up: Is there really a God? And if so, how much fun did He have creating the dumbest of people to inhabit this Earth? And why do most of them have to end up in politics and pretend like they care?

Many people have died and are still dying every day from causes that are otherwise easily preventable (hunger, homelessness — I could go on and on). As the great George Carlin once said, "Why not get rid of all those expansive (elitist, useless) golf courses and bulldoze those cemeteries and build houses for those who are still alive?"

Now, doesn't that make complete logical sense to you? Would you rather save someone's memory with a tangible reminder, like a headstone, while knowing full well that whatever you do — kneel 'til the cows come home, pray until God himself personally answers you — your dead loved ones will never in a million years rise again and come back to life? Wouldn't you rather do something for those who are still here, alive (but now barely) kicking?

I don't know what I'm doing about life today. Maybe I shouldn't even try. After all, I'm still in Amherst. I think I'll go bulldoze some cemetery or help build houses on a golf course, and do some good. Or is that a bad thing? I don't know anymore.

MULTICULTURAL AFFAIRS

From Gaza to Guatemala

"You shall not oppress a stranger, you know the heart of a stranger, for you were strangers in Egypt." - Exodus 23:9.

The dimensions of Israel's oppressive activities have not been confined to the West Bank and Gaza. In fact, Israel has become one of the leading counter-insurgency agencies of the world. Drawing from CIA estimates, Israel ranks among the five leading nations in the business of exporting arms to the world and is the largest supplier of arms to Latin America and Sub-Saharan Africa.

Elliot Monteverde Torres

Within the continent of Asia, Israel maintains ties with Taiwan, Thailand (since 1976), South Korea, the Philippines, Malaysia, and Singapore. South Africa, Swaziland, Malawi, Zaire, Kenya, Uganda, Gabon, Ivory Coast, Liberia and Morocco consitute the recipients among the African nations of Israel's military sales. Among the Latin American and Caribbean nations are: Mexico, El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, Nicaragua (until the fall of Somoza), Panama, Haiti, Dominican Republic, Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile and Argentina. According to the publication 'Israel Shahak;" "Israel's security assistance and arms supplies in the case of South Africa and Ecuador, are accompanied by the export of biblical films, handled by the same people!"

Israel's atrocious pattern of behavior against the Palestinians (including the recent killing of more than 20 and over 500 injured), and its assistance in oppressing people throughout the world can only force one to ponder over one question, asked in the publication "Race and Class," "How can it be that a people that inspired us [Third World people] so much to take up the fight against injustice, we now find arraigned against us as the enemies of our people? It is only reasonable that the rhetoric of 'Never Again' has come to mean in effect, 'Never Again us.' Consequently, it means others — Palestinians, [Guatemalan Indians], and so forth."

In fact, the issue of the Guatemalan Indians touches upon an unpleasant yet interesting topic in the attempt at unveiling atrocities reigning throughout the world: Israel's ties to Guatemala. Like South Africa and Israel, Guatemala has a demographic problem; the territory is wanted by the foreingers but not the sons and daughters of the land. The prevalent attitude is that of the exclusionist colonial settlers.

General Bendito Garcia, brother of General Lucas Garcia (former president of Guatemala), attributed the government's military success to Israel's assistance in a visit to Israel. In the Nov 22, 1981 edition of "Ma'ariv," Garcia explained. "We appreciate Israel; we see that Israel's assistance as the best soldier in the world today, and we look to him as a model and example to us." In an account that estimated 60,000 assassinated or 'disappeared' persons (mainly Indians), it is obvious that the 'student' has learned quite voraciously in dealing with its demographic problem almost masterfully, Garcia said.

Israel's multifaceted relations with Guatemala include:

- Since 1976 Israel has been the main provider of arms, aircraft, and military training to Guatemala.
- Training of 800 air force pilots to fly Israeli supplied Kfir fighter and Arava transport planes.
- Israeli-supplied radar systems throughout the country. Training of the military and G-2 police units in the use of interrogation techniques (i.e., torture), modern intelligence methods, psychological warfare, and terror.
- An Israeli-sponsored Army Electronics and Transmission School, opened in November 1981.
- Assistance from 300 Israeli advisers in the coup of March 1982 that brought General Rios Montt to power, and their training of officers backing him.
- Assistance from Israeli advisers in the design of the Programme of Assistance of Conflict Areas (PAAC), put into effect from August 1982. Developed jointly with advisers from South Africa and Taiwan, the program involves the creation of "model villages" that combine the features of the 'strategic hamlets' implanted in Vietnam and Israeli kibbutzim.
- A training camp in Guatemala where Israeli experts train "Contras" that also serves El Salvador, Honduras, Haiti, Chile and Bolivia and Argentina.
- The construction, in the northern province of Alta Verapaz, of a factory for the production of 5.56 calibre munition and Uzi machine guns, according to the book "Race and Class."

However, Israel's role in Central America is not an unaided expedition. "Israel's coordination with the Americans marks a departure from its previous activities in Central America as an independent supplier of arms. The new role brings Israel closer to acting as a surrogate for the U.S.," Phillip Taubsman wrote in the July 21, 1983 edition of the New York Times. "American officials said the Reagan administration, concerned about the congressional limitations in Central America, had encouraged the Israeli activities as a means of supplementing American security assistance to friendly governments," said Taubsman.

In Guatemala the Galil, an Israeli weapon, has become the standard rifle. Israeli non-commissioned officers are hired by landowners. A sectorial plan - modeled after Israel's experiences in Palestinian areas - and civil defense patrols, with profound effects on the Mayan society, are the constituents of the harsh existing realities of this nation. Israel has not only supplied the technology to carry out the genocide against the Indians but it has helped in the organization and commission of the atrocities committed by the Guatemalan military and police. To this date, Israel's representatives continue to work in Guatemala. In all, the facts are evident. Writes Alexander Cockburn in the February 2 edition of the Wall Street Journal, "Both the U.S. and Israel bear rather serious moral responsibility," for Guatemala. . . or the Third World.

It happens every day

The police are supposed to be the All-American bodyguards, whose duties are to protect and save the lives of all American citizens. The problem is all definitions, ideas, rules, standards and laws in which the police pledge to abide are enforced by a higher authoritative power structure. This structure is ruled by those in economic and political power (usually Whites) who have the ability to control and mediate what and how people within this structured society are to perceive the world around them.

Cheray O'Neal

Having lived in Amherst for many years, last Thursday's episode didn't come as a surprise. While driving home from a meeting, a friend and I noticed up ahead several flashing blue lights and as we came closer we noticed it was the police. What sparked our curiosity was that there wasn't just one cop car, there were two police cars and one police van. My friend asked me to look and see if it was anyone we knew and sure enough it was . . . A Black man, his girlfriend, and their child. The following incidents are what upsets me.

It appears as if they were pulled over because the woman forgot to turn her blinker on before she turned the corner (fine, that seems like a reasonable explanation). When they pulled her aside, they asked her for her license. She couldn't find it. But what I don't understand is why would they ask the passenger for his license — after all, he wasn't driving, so why did they need verification? Why wouldn't the officers call in her social security number and see that she had a valid license? Why did they call in his license?

The police found he had a warrant for an overdue parking ticket for $15, so they arrested him. Now he's shackled in chains (doesn't that sound familiar) and the girlfriend and her child are standing outside motionless, speechless and horrified.

The car is to be towed and the girlfriend is left to walk her child home (mind you her house is about two miles away, it was 8:30 p.m. and freezing outside). The question now is why were there three cop cars for two adults and a baby? And why, since there were three cop cars, couldn't any of the officers take her home?

Society's greatest misconception is that because you're an American citizen you have total freedom of speech and thought. But in all actuality you have this so-called freedom if-and-only-if it's within their (those in economic power) boundaries. This incident is one of the mildest to date. Police brutality comes in many forms. It can be delivered through physical force or mental torment, a stripping of your dignity and pride. The police are in a position to cover their tracks for we know they have many tracks to cover. They (the police) could say if questioned that they asked the passenger for his license simply so someone would be able to drive the car home. The real issue is he was a Black man and his face was all too familiar. Please ask yourself: Would the same incident occur if it were a White couple and their baby? It's a never ending struggle that we as African-Americans fight every day of our lives. . .let's see if you could deal with that!!

ARTS & LIVING

Unetsu, unparalleled in style, emotion

By LISA TUNG
Collegian Correspondent

Sankai Juku
Fine Arts Center
Saturday, Oct. 20

The Japanese Butoh dance company, Sankai Juku, performed The Egg Stands Out of Curiosity — Unetsu. Butoh dance started as an expressionistic art form by Tatsumi Hijikata and Kazuo Ohno in the 1960s to reflect Japan's post-war generation. Sankai Juku's director, Ushio Amagatsu has continued this original Japanese dance form since 1975.

REVIEW

The five male dancers performed a one-act ritualistic dance in seven uninterrupted scenes with enduring intensity and spontaneity. Draped in various white and cream robes, the dancers looked like inhuman spirits with chalk-white bodies and shaven heads. Their stark presence accented the dark stage, also colored by sculptural white shapes and rich blue lighting. A rectangular pool of water commanded the center as a waterfall and a sand-fall fell from above. Suspended gong-like bells, a hanging pyramid, and eggs were other elements of the set that created a beautiful and eerie dreamworld of visions and sounds.

The first dancer, draped in a long cloth at the waist, opened the piece by dipping his foot into the pool and created a ripple painting on the above screen. He walked into the water blowing a long horn, calling with its bass voice. The four other dancers responded with a searching cry of their own. In the pool at the end of "From Beyond," they crouched and folded into their legs to resemble nesting eggs.

In "Wind," the solo dancer lay still while his hands slowly motioned toward a white egg with reverence and curiosity. Lying on his back, he appeared to float as his arms and legs snaked curves throughout his body. As he was upright, he increased his winding, curving movements with fluid softness.

The four eggs in the water "cracked" open as the dancers rolled over with their legs and arms swimming in the air. That moment opened a brighter and energetic mood in the darkness of the dance. At one point, the new spirits tried to stand in the water but kept falling down continuously. The dancers' bodies appeared boneless as they seemed to melt into the water like droplets. When they finally stood, they splashed and walked around in the water feeling their new life as new beings.

Before the solo dancer picked up the egg in "Musubi — Faint Light Infused," his robed body shifted back and forth behind the egg imitating the adjacent swinging pyramid. The trickle of the waterfall was the only sound during this meditative period. When he picked up the egg from its pedestal, a chord, similar to that of an orchestra warming up before a concert, struck and set a mood of anticipation and preparation. The chords began to blend together into a unified searching tone, as the egg led the dancer walking sideways across the stage. The egg, attracted to some new source, led its carrier to walk a circle in the pool. He then placed the egg under the waterfall, bathing it. At the moment the egg is dropped and split open, the four other dancers charged into the scene with sharp robotic movements. They appeared as death-like skeletons with their fluted, rib-like tops and blood-red fingertips. Accompanied by the deep synthesized chord of a shouting beast, the egg carrier was now disturbed as he opened his mouth in a silent yell under the waterfall. His arms opened and his body folded in to embody his cry.

Sankai Juku transformed the FAC stage into a world of pure sensations of color, light, darkness and sound that the viewer may have experienced internally or just watched and observed. The standing ovation from the amazed audience suggested the irrelevancy of whether they understood Unetsu's meaning. The range of emotions stirred by the dancers was enough to leave its powerful effect.

Fest fun for all

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Correspondent

The sun came out on Saturday, making a surprise appearance at the Central Residential Area Octoberfest. Aside from good weather, burgers and dogs, four bands entertained a crowd that grew to nearly 200 people. Each band was composed of students from the Central area, chosen from a sample of 12 who sent tapes to the Central Area Government.

TKR was the first group to hit the stage and their repertoire included a variety of 60s tunes. As they played, they showed versatility and harmony. Toward the end of their set they displayed this in a medley of Beatles songs. "Oh Darling!" which they performed sometime before the medley, was impressive — especially considering the fact that Paul McCartney had trouble singing it back in 1969.

The Groove Dogs came on after a brief intermission, and played a series of acoustic numbers, relaxing the audience with covers of Simon & Garfunkel, Crosby, Stills & Nash, Neil Young, and many others. However, the audience was not unresponsive, as they managed to come out of sedation and cheer between songs.

Creating a radical shift in the direction of the music was Baba Yaga. This band played a majority of originals, mostly ska-type. "We play skunk [ska/funk] but mostly countriskajah," explained guitarist and lead singer Pete McCauley. The covers that they did perform were'nt mainstream, for the most part. They included a Bim Skala Bim song and a cover of a cover of "Tears of a Clown."

Lastly, Bongos to Heaven brought an original sound, best described as funk/rock. They also performed mainly originals. "Think about it," their self-written opener, showed incredible talent in the lead singer, who sounded like a relaxed Janis Joplin.

Screams of "Jane's!" led them to close the day with the Jane's Addiction anthem, "Jane Says."

The event ended and the sun began to set. Organizers of Octoberfest were satisfied — but Steve Mcafly, Central Area president was wondering. "I don't know how we are going to top this for the Spring Fling," (the spring celebration in Central area). Yes, it was a successful day of procrastination.

ONE MILLION OF THE BEST MINDS IN AMERICA HAVE ALREADY CHOSEN THE BEST RETIREMENT PROGRAM.

TIAA-CREF.

TIAA-CREF is building a sound financial future for more than 1,000,000 people in the education and research communities. And over 200,000 retirees are now enjoying the benefits of their TIAA-CREF annuities.

We currently offer you Supplemental Retirement Annuities (SRAs) and are working with sponsors of legislation that would allow the Board of Regents to establish an Optional Retirement Plan (ORP) in Massachusetts. ORP-type plans are currently offered at public institutions of higher education in 41 of the 50 states.

SOLID PERFORMANCE AND TIMELY INNOVATION

Whether you are just starting your career or you are nearing retirement we can help you prepare for the future. Since 1918, we've been dedicated to making sure that people in education and research can count on a comfortable retirement.

We pioneered the portable pension. We invented the variable annuity. In 1988, we created the CREF Money Market Account to give you more flexibility. And in March of this year, we introduced two new accounts, the CREF Bond Market Account and the CREF Social Choice Account, to let you shape and diversify your retirement investments even further.

At TIAA-CREF, we believe that steady incremental growth over the long term is the best way to build retirement income. This investment philosophy has worked well for over seventy years, and has provided retirement income for hundreds of thousands of people like you.

THE KEYS TO RETIREMENT INVESTING

Security, growth, and diversity are the keys to sound retirement investing: security, so the resources are sure to be there when it's time to retire; growth, so you'll have the income you need for the kind of retirement you want; and diversity to help protect you against volatility and to let you benefit from the strengths of several types of investments.

TIAA AND CREF—A SMART COMBINATION

TIAA's traditional annuity provides maximum safety, guaranteeing your principal and a specified interest rate. It also gives you the opportunity for growth through dividends — which we've declared every year for 41 years. In fact, TIAA's net earned rate has beaten the industry average for every one of those years.[1]

With CREF's variable annuity, you can choose from four different investment accounts, all managed by experts who understand the long-term strategies essential to sound retirement planning.

THE FIRST CHOICE IN EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

The TIAA-CREF retirement system is specifically designed for people in education and research. You may move from one institution to another many times in your career, so your annuities move with you to any of over 4,200 institutions with TIAA-CREF retirement plans. You need financial security, so the system provides retirement income you cannot outlive. Plus, the TIAA-CREF system offers:

Performance: The CREF Stock Account outperformed the mutual fund industry averages for the last one-, five- and ten-year periods. The CREF Money Market Account has shown excellent returns since its inception, outperforming the industry average since May of 1988.[2]

Responsiveness: Our experienced counselors are ready to answer your questions. Call our toll-free numbers for performance figures or information about your personal annuity accumulations.

Strength: Your future is protected by the largest private retirement system in the world. We have done so well, for so many, for so long, that we currently manage over $80 billion in assets.

HEY, BUCK? YOU KNOW ANY THING ABOUT TIE SMOKES? I KEEP FINDING ON MY BED!
HEE HEE. YOU MEAN ME? I'M THE ONE WHO'S BEEN LEAVIN' 'EM FOR YOU.
AND, WHO ARE YOU?
YOU CAN CALL ME BUTTSY. I'M THE BATTALION TOBACCO LIAISON.
ON BEHALF OF A GRATEFUL INDUSTRY, I'VE BEEN CHARGED WITH DISTRIBUTING 10,000 CARTONS OF CIGARETTES TO OUR FIGHTING MEN AND WOMEN — FREE OF CHARGE.
NO KIDDING? WOW!
OUT OF THE GOODNESS OF WHOA! YOU KNOW YOU LOOK LIKE BOOKA, RIGHT? PEOPLE TELL YOU THAT?

LOOK MOM, I MADE A MASK.
ARE YOU GETTING READY FOR HALLOWEEN?
HUH? NO, THIS IS FOR EVERY DAY. YOU KNOW HOW HOBBES ALWAYS SNEAKS UP FROM BEHIND AND POUNCES ON ME?
NO...
WELL, HE DOES. BUT IF YOU WEAR A MASK LIKE THIS ON THE BACK OF YOUR HEAD, TIGERS CAN'T TELL WHICH WAY YOU'RE FACING, AND THEY CAN'T SNEAK UP.
I THINK YOUR TRAIN OF THOUGHT IS A RUNAWAY.
I READ THEY WEAR THESE IN INDIA. HERE, I MADE A MASK FOR YOU, TOO.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Be on the lookout for opportunities to advance your career goals. Some funds may be delayed. Getting too involved in a friend's business could strain your relationship. Go slow.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A new financial plan brings good luck. You may decide to change residences. Keeping a low profile at work helps you observe and learn. A shopping trip promises real satisfaction.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Vital ground work can be laid today. Timely communications will aid your plans. Heed the advice of your inner. The sparks of love and friendship are kindled.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Good fortune shines in a surprising way today. Seminars or business trips put you in touch with potential clients. Matters of a private nature enjoy favorable influences.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Progress rewards your efforts. Be alert to new career and financial options. Written communications carry greater weight. Carefully chosen attire will score points with prospective employers.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Success will come quicker if you seek help from people who share your interests. Count on friends to keep their promises. Keep tabs on old buddies.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Hasty choices could put your long range plans in jeopardy. Discuss your options with responsible people. Although you have no trouble getting your way, make intelligent concessions in loved ones.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Today's forecast includes an increase in earnings, either through your regular work or special projects. A face-to-face meeting with someone influential is a source of excitement.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): An influential person is easier to approach now. Just be certain you have done your homework before presenting a proposition. A problem with a younger person can be ironed out.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A feeling of uncertainty could hamper you. Schedule a conference with the appropriate person if you have questions about the future. Romance may be uppermost in your thoughts.

PISCES (Feb. 9-March 20): A witty conversationalist, you enjoy meeting new people. Be a good listener and you will learn something of value. A special course of study could wise you up considerably.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Your instincts are right on target where your work is concerned. Trust your feelings if buying or selling. It is time to showcase your special talents. Cultivate people you meet at social events.

Children's Fair draws over 2,000

By SUZY HERRING
Collegian Correspondent

Kids of all ages flocked to the Common School's 19th annual Children's Fair Saturday. Over 2,000 people turned out to the Amherst Town Common to enjoy games, crafts and refreshments.

Proceeds from the fair benefit the independent school's financial aid program.

Attractions were geared toward children aged 3 to 12. Children exchanged their tickets to participate in various activities. Those with an artistic bent could express themselves at the sand art table. For four tickets apiece, they created intriguing designs by layering colored sand in glass jars. At the popular pumpkin-decorating table, children could take personalized pumpkins home gilded with glitter, false hair, felt eyes and of course, lots of Elmer's glue.

For one ticket per chance, the sports-oriented could try their skill at shooting basketballs or getting a soccer ball past a goalie. An obstacle course for toddlers seemed like fun, since many parents had trouble pulling their children away.

Other attractions included face painting, a roulette-style Wheel of Fortune and a haystack for jumping in. As coordinator Mark Levy pointed out, "There's something for everyone."

Levy's favorite aspect of the fair is that it is a community effort. Parents do much of the organizing, as well as working the tables and selling tickets. They also made most of the food, which ranged from popcorn to cupcakes to sesame noodles. Local merchants helped as well, donating ice cream and soda, the prizes for Wheel of Fortune and the raffle. This year's raffle prize was a Fuji on-and-off road bicycle donated by Valley Bicycle of Amherst.

Even the schoolchildren themselves helped out. Younger students designed recyclable paper bags for use at the used toy and book sale. Older students created pumpkin-shaped medals for the successful finishers of the obstacle course. Some of the classes have been studying calligraphy and plan to make thank-you notes to send to the donating merchants.

According to Levy, planning for this year's fair began shortly after last year's fair ended. However, he said even with that head start, for the final two weeks, everyone is kept busy. As usual, though, the fair came off without a hitch. Even the weather cooperated.

Cross country teams place 3rd in A-10 Championships

• Men lose 2nd to St. Joe's by one point

By KEITH BENNETT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team finished third in the Atlantic 10 Championship Meet on Saturday.

The Minutemen had gone into the meet expecting to be battling Penn State for the top spot but found themselves instead in a close battle with St. Joseph's for second place.

Penn State once again dominated the field in this meet which they have seemed to own for the past several years. Penn State finished with 19 points, well below the score of any other team in the meet.

St. Joseph's finished with 64 points to barely edge out UMass for second place. The Minutemen finished third with 65 points. West Virginia was the fourth team to finish with 84 points.

"I was disappointed with the third place finish," coach Ken O'Brien said. "I thought we would have a pretty good chance of beating Penn State this year."

Although the scores may suggest that the Penn State runners were light years ahead of the other teams in the meet, O'Brien pointed out that that was not the case.

The front runners were grouped together in a pack of about twelve runners, which included members of Penn State, St. Joseph's and UMass, with less than a mile to go. The race became a sprint to the finish line, in which Penn State won.

Pat Wimmer of Penn State was the overall winner with a time of 25:18 over the five mile course. The top runner from St. Joseph's managed to place second but Penn State took the next four places to seal the victory.

Seniors Jon Corso and Tom Degnan led the way for UMass as they have all season with the seventh and eighth places overall. Their times were 25:30 and 25:32, respectively. The difference between Corso's time and that of the fourth place finisher was a matter of only three seconds.

Senior Joe Milette continued to show improvement after getting off to a slow start this season. He finished 14th in 26:00.

Milette was followed by senior Gerry Squires (26:12) in 17th place, freshman Craig Cormier (26:13) in 19th place and sophomore Pat Reed (26:16) in 20th place.

The Minutemen will next compete in the New England Championships on Oct. 26.

• Women bettered by Penn State, WVU

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team accomplished exactly what they set out to do. Showing a strong team effort, UMass finished third in the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Penn State won the meet convincingly with 29 points, followed by West Virgina with 74 points and UMass with 91.

"We knew we would not beat Penn State or West Virginia," said head coach Julie LaFreniere. "They are just too strong for us, but we felt third was in our reach."

UMass edged out St. Josheph's (108), Rhode Island (111), Rutgers (115), and others to finish third.

UMass was lead by freshman Kelly Liljeblad, who finished seventh overall with a time of 18:34. She missed winning Freshman-of-the-League honors to Penn State's Jen Weaver, a high school All-American, who edged her by one tenth of second.

"Kelly ran out of her socks," said LaFreniere. "She ran the best race of her life. It was incredible to see her run with some of the top people in the country."

Becky Johnson was the next UMass runner to finish, coming in 16th. Johnson usually runs with Liljeblad but finished in 19:04.

"Becky was a little tight," said LaFreniere. "I know she can run better. However, 16th is nothing to be upset about."

Dana Goldfarb and Kathy Holt finished 20th and 21st, respectively. They were able to run in the pack that LaFreniere said would be the key to UMass success.

"Dana and Kathy ran very well," said LaFreniere. "They were both tremendous and finishing together is a big plus."

Finishing out the UMass scoring was Michelle St. Laurent, who came in 32nd. Although she was originally expected to run with Goldfarb and Holt, LaFreniere said she was still pleased with her performance.

"The whole team ran well and we are very happy with our performance. Although Kelly stole the show and was the star, it was a team effort."

UMass will once again need a team effort this Saturday when they compete in the New England Championships. At this meet UMass will get their long-awaited rematch with arch-rival Connecticut as well as competition from Springfield, New Hampshire, Providence and Harvard.

Wilkos' father angered by ambulance delay

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Gary Wilkos was outfitted with a halo brace yesterday at Christiana Hospital in Stanton, Del. and is in "good spirits," according to his father, Richard Wilkos.

"All the players and coach [Jim] Reid called. His spirits are really up," he said.

Wilkos, the sophomore quarterback of the University of Massachusetts football team, suffered a fractured vertebra at the base of his neck in Saturday's football game at Delaware Stadium.

Wilkos' father said he was outraged by the slow response of ambulance crews after his son was injured. Both ambulances stationed at the stadium Saturday were away at other emergencies when Wilkos was hurt.

A third ambulance was mistakenly dispatched to the Carpenter Sports Center two miles north of the football stadium, according to Gary Summerville, associate director of public safety for the University of Delaware.

Wilkos lay on the field for 36 minutes before the ambulance arrived to take him to Christiana.

"It was totally insane. There is no explanation," said Wilkos' father. "They didn't even have a blanket to cover the kid. That really angered me."

Delaware Gov. Michael Castle arranged for a specialist from Washington to examine Wilkos at Christiana, according to Reid.

Wilkos will stay at Christiana this week and will spend some time at his Staten Island, N.Y., home before returning to UMass, his father said. He will wear the brace, which immobilizes his shoulders, neck and head, for three months.

"He'll be able to get around. He'll just have to take it slow," said Wilkos' father. "Everything looks good. From what they say he's going to be 100 percent."

Reds proved what Jose couldn't do

"It don't mean nothing 'til you prove it all night."
—Richard Milhous Nixon

The Oakland A's, those crazy Oakland A's. Dynasty, that's what people were saying. The word 'repeat' was commonly used this season when World Series talk would spark up. Nobody ever thought the team that jailbird Pete Rose created would halt the inhumanly solid ballclub of Oakland, but . . .

At 30-1 odds, the Cincinnati sweep was probably the best bet of the year. It makes me want to take the Miami Heat against the rest of the league in the NBA playoffs, but that's another story.

Dave Szpila

Cincinnati pitching was amazing, allowing only 1.70 earned runs a game for the series. The A's pitching wasn't much better than that of the Little League World Series, or maybe it was worse. Anyway, the series is over and an overview is needed, so here it goes.

First, a look at a few records set this year. Billy Hatcher owns three: best average in a four game series (.750), most consecutive hits (7), and most doubles (4). Chris Sabo set a record for most chances by a third baseman in a playoff game (10) and Jose Canseco got . . . NOTHING!

I apologize to any Jose fans, but the guy just plain stinks in playoff action. He batted .083 for the series. At $5 million a year, that's, hmm, let's see, carry the two, rounded off to the, oh, you figure it out. The point: Jose gets the Halloween Gallows Award for the biggest choke in the World Series.

Not that he was the only one on his team who forgot how to win. Not that he didn't crack a tater. He just annoys me.

The Reds annoyed me too. But I am over that now. I am a Pirates fan and when the Bucs lost the NLCS I thought my semester was shot. That, of course, is another story.

The Reds are the champs and we all must live with it. I can; I picked 'em. Even fans of the Red Sox have to appreciate Cincinnati. They did what the American League could not, and that was a very tall order.

One final note here, well, maybe two. Jose Rijo received the series MVP and he also gets the ever popular SZPILA Award for closing the mouths of A's fans everywhere. Thanks Jose, because of you, the world is truly a better place to live.

Also . . . PIRATES IN 1991 BOYS, DON'T YOU ALL FORGET IT!

Administrators release plan to reduce costs

By PRESTON P. FORMAN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts administrators have released a two-part plan which details proposed furlough days and retrenchment of specific departments.

Meanwhile, officials of the faculty union, the Massachusetts Society of Professors, are proposing their own solutions for reducing costs and the total amount of furlough days.

In a memo sent last week to the MSP, the administration said it plans to "close down the Amherst campus [for five days] to the maximum extent feasible."

The five days, November 23, December 24, 26, 27 and 28, were identified by the administration as time periods of least disruption to the campus community while "accomplishing our required spending reduction." No classes will be affected during the proposed shutdown.

The second part of the plan involves a retrenchment by June 29, 1991 of four departments for an indefinite duration: Staff Development, Professional Preparation, Community Health Education and Organizational Development.

The administration has estimated savings of $1.92 million this fiscal year if the plan is approved by all unions.

MSP President John Cole said yesterday that the administration has agreed "in principle" to three proposals — early sabbatical leaves at half pay, half-time and job sharing. All the proposals are aimed at reducing the faculty payroll while trying to keep furlough days to a minimum.

"No one is enthusiastic about a pay cut or seeing one of their colleagues fired so what we must, as a union, ascertain what is necessary," he said.

Cole said the union, which represents some 1,200 faculty and librarians at this campus, still remains firmly in opposition to any furlough or retrenchment plan.

He said the union does not know the amount of savings the union's proposals would accomplished since it is undetermined how many faculty would participate in the voluntary program.

Students rally against CLT again

By KENDRA PRATT
Collegian Staff

Despite yesterday's drizzle, some twenty University of Massachusetts students rallied on the steps of the Student Union against the tax rollback ballot question that they said would continue state funding cuts to public higher education, making higher education unaffordable.

The Citizens for Limited Taxation petition, ballot question three, would roll state tax and fee rates back to 1988 levels if passed by voters in the Nov. 6 election. Proponents of the question want the rollback to be a tool to restructure state government and to control legislative spending.

The statewide impetus behind the CLT petition can be traced nationally through the legacy of 'Reaganomics,' said Marc Kenen, a UMass graduate student.

"After 10 years of destructive and stupid economic policies, the day of reckoning has come to the entire country," he said. "In Massachusetts, who is going to pay for the deficit? Is it going to be the people who made a fortune off of the 'Massachusetts Miracle' or is it going to be students and working class people?"

Kenen asked the protestors to think about who the CLT supporters are in the state and why they want to reduce taxation.

"CLT is a front for the High Technology Council of Massachusetts, a group of 200 business who thrived off of the high tech explosion in the state and now want to thrive by not paying taxes," he said.

Center helps Asians

UACC celebrates first anniversary today

By ALEXANDER NGUYEN
Collegian Staff

Highlighting Asian Awareness Week, the United Asia Cultural Center at the University of Massachusetts is celebrating its first anniversary today.

The Center will celebrate tonight with a party which will feature musical and dance performances of different Asian cultures.

"It may seem strange that we're celebrating amidst such difficult times at the University but life must go on the best it can for students," said professor Lucy Nguyen.

"In Asian cultures, during such difficult times, we come together as a family and share in brotherhood and sisterhood. That's how Asians have always survived wars, family spirit, not money," Nguyen said.

Nguyen said that the Asian community wants to share this "family spirit" with the rest of the campus community.

"There's a misconception about what the Center is. People think that its there to run cultural programs," Amy B. Chee said, a UMass sophomore. "They forget that it's a place where you can sit with people and talk, about anything."

"The Center is something that is permanent, I hope. We can always go back to it, its like home, you know where the welcome matt is," Chee said.

According to Nguyen, in its first year the Center has not only been a home for Asian students, it has presented many programs such as traditional Vietnamese music, a lecture on Chinese culture and a photo documentary of Cambodians.

"This Cultural Center is a big part of student life and education," Nguyen said.

Nguyen said that it is important for students to feel as comfortable as possi-

Americans head to Jordan after being freed from Iraq

By ANDREA HAMILTON
The Associated Press

Fourteen Americans left the Iraqi capital for Jordan yesterday after being freed by Saddam Hussein's government. They departed as Britain worked to gain the release of 50 sick or elderly Britons.

"I was waiting for this moment. I am extremely happy, but sad at the same time because I am leaving many of my friends and colleagues," Jack Fraser, one of the freed Americans, told an Associated Press reporter in Baghdad.

Fraser, 53, of Santa Ana, Calif., worked for a construction company and had been held in a diplomatic compound in Baghdad.

Another freed American, 44-year-old John Thompson, said, "I was in Iraq for the last four years, working on a Baghdad city master plan."

Thompson said he was eager to see his 68-year-old mother, Lilo Thompson of Frankfurt, Germany, because she is going blind. "She had a retinal separation and the stress that I'm stuck in Iraq had caused her a heart attack," he said. "I'm her only child and she wanted to see me badly."

About 1,000 Americans remain trapped in Iraq and Kuwait.

On Monday, Salim Mansoor, an Iraqi-American who met with Saddam, said 14 ailing or elderly Americans would be freed.

Several of the American men who left Iraq today appeared to be very young and two were reportedly dependents of U.S. diplomats. It was not known why Iraq decided to free the younger Americans instead of sick and elderly people.

There were indications, meanwhile, that the Arab world was softening its hard line in dealing with Iraq — including a statement by Saudi King Fahd that Saddam would not lose face if he were to withdraw his troops.

If Iraq took that step and restored the al-Sabah family as Kuwait's rulers, Saudi Arabia and Egypt said there could be talks on the invasion of the oil-rich emirate.

Kunstler discusses constitutional violations

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

The people of the United States must take a stand to defend the rights bestowed upon them by the forefathers of the nation, said constitutional lawyer and founder of the New York's Center for Constitutional Rights.

William Kuntsler

William Kunstler, famous for his successful defense of political activists Abbie Hoffman, Martin Luther King Jr., and more recently, Gregory Johnson in Texas v. Johnson, over the right to burn the American flag, spoke to 200 people in the Student Union Ballroom last night as part of the Distinguished Vistiors Program.

"The Bill of Rights," said Kunstler, "has been destroyed for many people. 'The Gang of Five' [justices on the Supreme Court] have systematically destroyed those amendments [in the Bill of Rights]."

According to Kuntsler, the Reagan Court has done such things as taken away the First Amendment rights of people in American prison systems, inhibited the right to privacy of women in Mississippi, and barely overturned a dual-parental consent law in Missouri by a vote of 5-4.

"With [David] Souter on and [William] Brennan off, Lord knows what will happen to the abortion issue," he said.

Kunstler also cited other infringements upon the Bill of Rights, including the Bail Reform Act of 1984, which allows a judge to disallow a defendant's right to bail if the judge deems the suspect "too dangerous."

A violation of the Fourth Amendment, which protects against illegal search and seizure, now allows the police to search without a proper warrant of the authorities were acting in "good faith," even if the wrong address or name appears on the warrant, said Kunstler.

"As long as you are acting in 'good faith,' that is considered by the High Court to be all right and totally reasonable," he said.

A defendant, knowing the police destroyed evidence which could lead to an acquittal, must prove the destruction of such evidence was destroyed in "bad faith," which is almost impossible to do, said Kunstler.

Random drug testing, which Kuntsler claims is a violation of the Fourth Amendment, has also been deemed legal by the Supreme Court.

In opposition of the Eighth Amendment, which states no cruel or unnecessary punishment of prisoners, Kunstler cited the use of behavior modification in order to change the psychology of political prisoners. He said the prison system in the United States is "disgusting and a failure."

The most recent violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, which allows for no discrimination the basis of color or creed, is the destruction of the Affirmative Action program, with the Court changing the burden of proof to make it almost impossible to win a case, he said.

Before, people bringing Affirmative Action suits against a company had only to prove a pattern of discrimination. Now, the plaintiff must prove bad faith as well as the pattern.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990, which would have rectified these later precedents set by the Supreme Court was vetoed three days ago by President Bush.

"Our great exalted leader decided to veto it," Kuntsler said. "For [Bush] to say it was a quota system was an outright lie and misinformation."

Kunstler said the American people should remember that justices were not "nine paragons of virtue . . . but rather simple political appointees."

Chomsky speaks of change

MIT linguist discusses New World Order

By MAURA CANAVAN
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Noam Chomsky, long-time political activist and professor of Linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, gave a lecture last night on 'New World Order' at the Robert Crown Center at Hampshire College.

This program was sponsored by the Five College Program in Peace and World Security Studies and is the sixth in the PAWSS fall semster lecture series.

Michael Klare, director of the PAWSS program, introduced Chomsky as "the leading linguist in the world." He spoke of the outstanding literary works that have been produced by Chomsky as well as his critical views on foreign policy.

"Dr. Chomsky is an example of what scholarship really should be," Klare said. "He is willing to make a moral stand and speak the truth."

Chomsky began by discussing the United Nations and its inability to function as it was designed to. He argued that the United States has been the leader in vetoing resolutions or voting alone on essentially all relevant issues such as terrorism, human rights and disarmament.

"The United Nations has been unable to function due to U.S. blocking," Chomsky said. "The U.S. has been virtually alone in barring peaceful resolution in the Middle East and settling the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Chomsky explained that on August 2 "an aggression [by Iraq toward Kuwait] took place that the U.S. was opposed to, so the United Nations could finally act."

He said that this American intervention is just one of many and by no means the most serious. "Hussein interfered with crucial U.S. interests. If we lose control of our mainstream interests in the Middle East, we have a feel we have a right to invade."

Chomsky also analyzed the the U.S. invasion of Panama, an act he said was condemned by the international community. "Noriega became a bad guy," he said. "Third World nations must be in line with U.S. business interests." He added that this invasion was "handled with silence and deceit."

"Characteristically the United States has been for years opposed to diplomacy and negotiations," Chomsky said. He said the U.S. is politically weak though militarily and economically strong and added that the present situation in the gulf could be catastrophic.

"New World Order is the Old World Order only with slightly different pretexts," said Chomsky.

He concluded by commenting on the present status of the United States as a world power. "We don't run the world economically anymore," Chomsky said. "Economically, the world is basically tripolar."

Syrian reporters blast American journalism

By MEREDITH O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

The U.S. media does not fairly represent the concerns of Third World people with objectivity and fairness, specifically regarding the situation in the Persian Gulf, three Syrian journalists said Monday.

Syrian reporters Riad Darwish, Razouk Al-Ghawi and Fouad Mardoud said in an interview with the Collegian that American reporters focus too much on sensational events occuring in the Third World in order to boost their readership/ratings among American consumers. They said that only when a conflict does arise do Third World nations receive American news coverage.

"There is very little coverage of Syrian issues except when major events occur, unlike us in Syria who cover all of the cultural, social and scientific events in the United States," Al-Ghawi, news director of the only Syrian television station. "And we are not forced to cover that."

While the American media tends to concentrate on the oil theme of the Gulf crisis, Al-Ghawi said Syrian journalists go beyond that "narrow" scope. "It is important for journalists to talk with objectivity on the conflict," he said.

They said the media's focus on the oil aspect, while virtually ignoring the viewpoints of other Arab nations, is testimony to a Eurocentric bias evident in American reporting.

"[Journalists] should try to present the truth from different points of view and not base his or her reporting on opinions," said Darwish, editor-in-chief of the Al-Wahdah Daily Newspaper.

Panelists speak out on prevention of violence

By ADAM MYERSON
Collegian Correspondent

In a forum addressing the issue of harassment, panelists focused on the responsibility of the bystander to speak out against racially, sexually and homophobicly-motivated violence.

The first panelist, Ervin Staub of the Psychology department, asked why "we devalue groups of society who are perceived to be different."

He went on to explore the functions and origins of devaluation, citing fear and ignorance as the main reasons it takes place.

Staub stated the power of "bystanders" in our society, and implored that these bystanders take an active role in helping to "change our culture."

Arlene Avakian of the Women's Studies department followed, focusing on the power structure in the United States, and how it promotes violence against women, homosexuals and minorities.

She pointed out that white, heterosexual men have the majority of influence in our society, and how that was being reinforced in education and the media.

Avakian tied this in with the disruption of Arthur Keene's Culture Through Film class last year by fraternity Phi Mu Delta, in which they were viewing the life story of asassinated gay politician Harvey Milk. She claimed that it is a society that would allow for actions such as this that would allow for women to be raped.

Closing up the panel was Dean of Education, Bailey Jackson. Dean Jackson made an interesting analogy comparing hate crime to a "car careening down a hill, out of control." He said that there were five different ways one could react to the car: one could cheer it on, study it, simply observe it, not see it at all, or try to stop it.

Only the last reaction would help to end oppression in our society, he commented. He continued to say that men must fight sexism in our society, and must be "willing to act out against oppression," denouncing the bystander who witnesses the out of control car and does nothing to stop it.

The presentations were followed by an open discussion between the speakers and the audience, providing for some very heated debate.

Phi Mu Delta president Jeffrey Fitton addressed the forum, stating for the first time that although his fraternity was indeed responsible for disrupting a class, it was not an act of homophobia, as they had no way of knowing that the film being shown was on Harvey Milk.

The evening closed on a note of respect and tolerance for all the opinions voiced during the forum, and a hope that it would continue and spread throughout the campus and community.

Madson: EWC a priority for the future

During the 12 years that I have been on this campus, students, faculty and staff have supported Student Affairs in its efforts to build a comprehensive set of programs and services for our students.

These programs and services are needed in order to attract, retain and graduate students who are academically qualified and ethnically and culturally diverse. Since the fall of 1988, the Division of Student Affairs has lost over 13 percent of its state funding.

Dennis L. Madson

The loss of these funds has set in motion a painful process that has resulted in reductions in important student services as well as much anger and frustration.

The decision to make cuts at the Everywoman's Center was arrived at after considerable deliberation, including input from the Director of EWC Carol Wallace and final recommendations from the division head, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin.

Faced with the bleak prospect of apportioning current cuts and anticipating additional cuts, we will not reverse these cuts, although we hope to rebuild our student programs and services as soon as resources will permit.

Specifically, the EWC Advisory Board, the Student Affairs staff and other members of the campus have made a commitment to work together and with the Five College community to secure additional resources, both financial and human, to apply toward the functions and goals of the EWC.

We have established a budget group to increase the amount of student input into budget decisions. This group has been meeting regularly to share budget information and discuss program priorities.

Together we are exploring options for meeting the two most recent budget cuts totalling $10.6 million for the campus and will continue to work together to assure student input on any future cuts.

The group includes four students and three staff. They are Assistant Vice Chancellors Jo-Anne Vanin and Billy Weitzer, SGA President Natasha Diephuis, SGA Treasurer Karen Talbot, Graduate Student Senate President Pierre LaLiberte, Graduate Student Senate Executive Officer Sarah Lyon and myself. I encourage you to share your ideas and priorities with any member of this group.

We recognize that women have unique needs. We are committed to meeting those needs throughout Student Affairs as we work to provide appropriate services for all students.

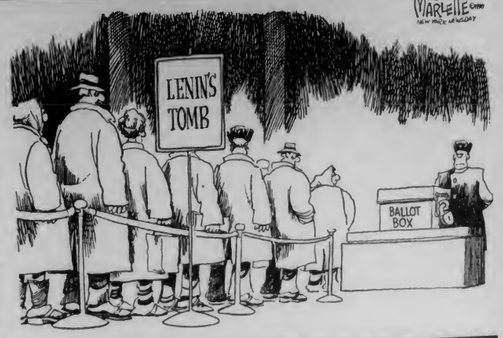
In addition, we have historically supported the EWC as a multi-faceted service agency designed to address the needs of women, both students and community members, as well as to assist in leading the campus on women's issues.

Unfortunately, because of the severity of budget cuts sustained by this campus, we cannot continue to provide the full array of services which our students need and deserve.

The Dean of Students and I are committed to maintaining EWC and its current services because they are critical to students and to Student Affairs.

While we cannot promise that EWC will look like, given the uncertain nature of the budget, our commitment to the Center includes an assurance that we will look first to other areas within Student Affairs to carry out future cuts and that faculty, staff and student input will be sought during this process.

Dennis L. Madson is the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs



Political agendas rule BOG

Ted Maravelias and Ed Corrigan have introduced a proposal to remove the LGBA seats from the Board of Governors. This would mean that gay, lesbian and bisexual students would no longer be assured any say in the running of the Campus Center/Student Union Complex.

The "rationale" behind their move to eliminate the LGBA seats is that these seats are appointed rather than elected. However, Maravelias and Corrigan are not attacking any other group with appointed seats. Clearly, the LGBA is being singled out because it is the LGBA, and this is a blatant homophobic attack.

The Board of Governors should not be used as a political tool to further personal agendas. The need of 10 percent of the student population should not be ignored because we are not heterosexual.

Help us fight this proposal. Come to the Board of Governors meeting this Thursday at 6 p.m. in the Campus Center (the room number will be listed in the directory) and let your voice be heard.

There will be no retreating into the closet.

An end of an era — technology and the death of the news

For about 20 years, I lived under the naive assumption that newspapers existed to provide news for us. I'll be the first to admit, it's not exactly the most objective coverage we'd ever get, and some of the stories (like trouble in Donald "I want to own the world" Trump's marriage) were a waste of a perfectly good dead tree. Still, I honestly believed that news was the primary function of newspapers.

Brace yourselves if you think the same way. We're wrong.

This past weekend, I went to a student newspaper convention in Hartford. We were told that the first presentation would make us depressed, but then would end on a cheerful note. Remember that.

The first part focused on the fact that there aren't as many jobs in the field anymore, that many newspapers are experiencing problems and other assorted doomsday cries. This didn't surprise me, considering the state of the economy.

The second part — the part that was supposed to make us feel good about wanting to work in this field — made me want to put a bullet in my head. Or move to a mountain top in Tibet.

This was about the direction newspapers are going in for the nineties. The message I got was that news is only the filler between ads. I heard the same thing in one of my Communications classes. I should have been prepared for what came next.

According to the speaker, no one wants to read an honest-to-God article. Big, flashy photos are in. Much like TV, Snippets are in, literacy is out. You know, like those AP briefs that are short 17-line paragraphs of almost no information. I guess I'm abnormal, since I tend to skip over items that short. I figure either the story isn't that important, or if it is, it wouldn't have enough information to satisfy me anyway.

Pamela McCarthy

Another thing that could possibly come in: prioritized snippets. Yes, that's right. If you are tired of thinking for yourself, the newspaper can do it for you. Instead of expending so much valuable energy deciding what issues and events you want to know most about, just check the numbers on the paragraphs. The number one story is the one you should read first. I'll admit, we already do that in newspapers. The first story on page one is the one the editors thought was the most important. Yes, there are problems with this, since the first story on page one is usually an in-depth expose on the newest slashing victim. But at least the readers are given some credit for intelligence.

There were other predictions. Bar-code scanners would bring you the rest of a story on your computer. That sounded good to me. The next part sounded awful to me. Bar-code scanners would also be on the ads on the front page (another sore spot with me, call me old-fashioned). Wave the scanner wand over the ad, and you order the item. One over-swing of your computer wand, and you could find yourself in debt.

Pictures, graphics, layout and, of course, advertising were the most important issues of this discussion. News stories? Forget it, people don't want to read. What was my problem with ads anyway? Was I behind the times, or something? The speaker couldn't understand why there was a long, loud, collective groan when she praised USA Today to high heaven. "I should have expected this from journalists," was her attitude.

If people wanted snippets of news, a blatant infiltration of advertising, lots of pictures and shallow coverage, they'd watch television. Newspapers, while far from perfect, would at least get into some depth of reporting. Granted, they are not perfect. There are problems with them. Still, it sounds better than what direction journalism is supposed to be going in. The questions we ask and the stories we cover leave much to be desired. But the stories give enough information to prompt intelligent thought among those of us who care enough to read them.

News snippets. Ads. Bar codes. Big, big pictures, like television. This is supposed to cheer me up?!

The Art of Editorialism: Finding a place to wallow in hate

What do the following have in common? The Everywoman's Center, Republican Club, Department of Defense, Israel, question three, John Silber, budget cuts, tokenism and the word "appalled?"

Mark B. Adler

They are all guest stars on the Editorial page. Would you like to write your own original column but you really don't feel angry towards something that anyone else cares about? Well, your dreams are now fulfilled.

In order to be a good columnist you need only three things that separate the women from the 'wymmin': a marginal typing ability, friends on the editorial board and lots of hatred.

There's only one thing that all editorial columnists love. They love to hate. Hatred rules. I don't mean simple dislike or annoyance. I mean blood-boiling, bone-crushing, all-consuming HATE. Without hatred, the editorial page would be a bore.

Therefore, I have decided to write the ultimate editorial. Watch me now: This will be full of things that I despise.

I hate politics. I have had my share of politicking in House Councils, Area Government and the Board of Governors, but I didn't like a thing I saw, and I'm thoroughly sick of student politics.

Note the change from "politics" to "student politics?" I'd like to think that there's a difference between UMass and the real world; yet with a cursory glance at the state of government, I see no contrariety. Hating the government is a must in editorials.

I hate sleeping through classes. It's embarrassing, uncomfortable, unnecessary and I should have just stayed in bed. After a certain all-nighter, I went to one of my most interesting classes: History of the Jewish Holocaust. We had a guest speaker that day — a survivor, I think. I can't remember because I fell asleep and drooled on my notebook. I always feel like I've wasted my time and disappointed the teacher.

I hate generic protest chants. "Hey-hey/ ho-ho/ fill-in-the-blank has got to go!" or my favorite: "What do we want?/Press coverage!/When do we want it?/Noooow!" If your complaint is genuine, please be original, damn it.
